Cardinal credits court nomination civility, asks for it to continue

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The day before the opening of the Supreme Court term, Washington's Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick lauded "a period of greater civility in the selection of our chief justice."

At the annual Red Mass that traditionally precedes the court's opening, Cardinal McCarrick asked for continued civility from a congregation at St. Matthew Cathedral that included President George W. Bush, new Chief Justice John Roberts and White House counsel Harriet Miers, who was nominated the next morning to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

The 52nd annual Red Mass drew a standing-room-only crowd of 1,450 people. Dignitaries included four Supreme Court associate justices, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and hundreds of people involved in law and politics.

The cardinal said people from different parties and with different points of view should work together for the common good.

"I pray that civility will continue," he added, "because it is so important not just for good government, but for the good care of our people who look here to all of you and your colleagues for the kind of leadership that is not destructive and not too intensely partisan."

Cardinal McCarrick said civility offers the best way for people of different points of view to work together and face the challenges of the world.

"We know that we must become friends again, not agreeing on everything, of course, but striving to dialogue more gently, more positively, more careful to set the conversation within a forum of mutual respect by being willing to listen for the good points that are always present in every reasonable discourse and will help us learn again to build and not to tear down," he said.

The cardinal said the great challenges of modern times include such things as the effect of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita on the poor, international terrorism, the effects of "AIDS in Africa and here in our own neighborhoods, and poverty and hunger among so many people of our world."

He concluded by comparing the need for civility and working together for the common good to that day's Gospel from Matthew 21, the parable of the vineyard workers.

"You and I and all of us here who have our own responsibility in this vineyard are called to come together, each in his or her own way, to put our hands to that task so that the Lord of the vineyard might be pleased with our service and he might bless it with peace and plenty for ourselves and our neighbor and for all this beloved land of ours," he said.

The concelebrating bishops wore red vestments to represent the color of fire, a symbol of the Holy Spirit. The annual Mass invokes God's blessings and guidance in the administration of justice.

New Orleans Archdiocese projects $40 million deficit by end of year

WASHINGTON (CNS) — As the Archdiocese of New Orleans took small steps back to normalcy after the devastation of Hurricane Katrina, archdiocesan officials estimated a negative cash flow of $40 million by the end of the year.

The projection was based on assumptions about drastically reduced parish giving and income from federal grants that are used to operate many Catholic Charities programs.

Millions more could be needed to repair or rebuild facilities damaged by the hurricane, depending on whether insurers assess the damage as flood-related or wind-related.

Although the archdiocese's insurance coverage for wind-related damage provides for full replacement value, it has only about $13 million in flood insurance. A preliminary assessment of about 50 archdiocesan buildings indicated there was at least $84 million in flood damage, leaving a shortfall of more than $70 million.

The archdiocese hopes that regulations of the Federal Emergency Management Agency will allow for the reimbursement for cleanup of nonchurch facilities such as schools and residences. Under the current regulations, cleanup of churches is not reimbursable.

Although the archdiocese kept all of its approximately 9,000 employees on full salary through the end of September, it recently notified them that an unknown number would be laid off Oct. 3 and receive two weeks of severance pay.

On the positive side, New Orleans Archbishop Alfred C. Hughes celebrated Mass for the first time since the Aug. 29 hurricane at St. Louis Cathedral in the city's French Quarter. The archdiocese, which has been operating out of the Diocese of Baton Rouge, La., since the storm hit, also began a census of parishioners scattered throughout the country on its Web site.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope tells religious that church still needs their prayers, service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Catholic Church always has relied on the prayers, prophetic voice and dedicated service of religious priests, brothers and sisters and still needs them today, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"There is not a human or ecclesial environment where they are not present, often silently, but always hardworking and creative," the pope said in a Sept. 29 message to members of the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life.

"Certainly, consecrated life today is not without trials and difficulties, as is the case in other sectors of the church's life," the pope said to members who were holding their plenary meeting at the Vatican.

"But rather than list the difficulties that consecrated life encounters today, I want to confirm to all consecrated men and women the closeness, concern and love of the entire church," he said.

Pope Benedict encouraged members of religious orders to continue responding to the Second Vatican Council's call to make following Christ their first priority, placing nothing before love of Christ.

"The fire of love, which the Spirit infuses in their hearts, pushes them to constantly ask about the needs of humanity and how to respond, knowing well that only one who recognizes and lives the primacy of God" can respond to the real needs of men and women who are made in the image of God, the pope said.

"The formidable challenges" facing religious orders today, he said, can only be faced in a spirit of unity with the church, its leaders and the faithful.

Vatican announces formally that pope won't preside at beatifications

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — While the Vatican continues studying theological and pastoral issues surrounding the rites of beatification and canonization, Pope Benedict XVI will preside only over the canonization ceremonies, the Vatican said.

A formal announcement of the change, which Pope Benedict instituted at the beginning of his pontificate, was published Sept. 29 in L'Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper.

The communique from the Congregation for Saints' Causes said that while the study of the rites continues Pope Benedict will preside over canonizations, but beatifications, "which are still a pontifical act, will be celebrated by a representative of the Holy Father, who normally will be the prefect of the Congregation for Saints' Causes," Cardinal Jose Saraiva Martins.

"The rite of beatification will take place in the diocese which promoted the cause of the new blessed or in another suitable location," including the Vatican, with the approval of the Secretariat of State, it said.

Normally, it said, the beatification should take place in the context of the Mass or Eastern Catholics' Divine Liturgy.

Explaining the new policy and the concerns of the Vatican's study, Cardinal Saraiva Martins said there appeared to be a pastoral need to re-emphasize the "clear and essential" difference between beatification and canonization.

At a canonization, the pope issues a formal decree recognizing the candidate's holiness and permitting public remembrance of the candidate at liturgies throughout the church, the cardinal wrote in L'Osservatore Romano.

With a beatification, the pope concedes permission for limited public remembrances, usually among members of the candidate's religious order or in the diocese where the candidate lived and worked.

"The recent decision of the Holy Father, Benedict XVI, not to preside personally over the rites of beatification, responds to a widely perceived need to underline more strongly in the celebration the substantial difference between beatification and canonization and more visibly involve the particular churches in the beatification rites of their 'servants of God,'" the cardinal wrote.

Despite the local celebration, he said, a beatification is still a papal act and, therefore, must be coordinated with the Vatican.

U.N. nuncio cites 'duty' to work for disarmament

NEW YORK (CNS) — The nations of the world "have a duty" to work for disarmament, the Vatican nuncio to the United Nations said Oct. 3.

"The great majority of states want to move the disarmament agenda forward surely and speedily," Archbishop Celestino Migliore said at a meeting of the General Assembly's First Committee, which handles disarmament and security issues.

He called arms control and disarmament "fundamental pillars of the architure for peace" and criticized the recent U.N. 60th anniversary summit of world leaders for failing to act on draft proposals that would have pressed for global progress toward disarmament and the strengthening of international conventions or treaties against nuclear, chemical and biological weapons.

Archbishop Migliore called it "deplorable" that last May's conference to review the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty "ended without a single substantive decision."

Circle of prayer

LENOIR — Youths from St. Francis of Assisi Church in Lenoir recently walked a prayer labyrinth at St. Paul's Episcopal Church in Wilkesboro Sept. 11.

A period of prayer was led by Linda Cowart, youth minister at St. Francis of Assisi Church, before the 16 youths made their meditative walks through the labyrinth.

"As they walked and remembered those who had died on 9/11, they prayed and meditated the rosary," said Cowart. "Upon finishing, they were very quiet and contemplative."

"It was impressed with them. It was a very positive experience," she said.

Labyrinths, found in many medieval cathedrals, have seen a recent re-emergence as spiritual and prayer tools within many Christian communities. The contemporary versions of the cathedral labyrinths combine ancient Christian tradition with contemporary music, meditations, art, media and activities.

Whereas in a maze a participant can run into dead ends, a labyrinth has only one twisting path that weaves its way to the center and back out again. Often when a traveler seems to be close to the center, an abrupt turn takes him or her on a longer meditative journey.

Casting a hero

Greensboro sculptor creates tribute to firefighters

BY DEACON GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

GREENSBORO — Soon after the 9/11 tragedy, Tracy Simmons, the wife of Greensboro firefighter Capt. Mike Simmons, had a vision to bring honor to all cities' firefighters, past, present and future.

As a firefighter's daughter, she felt firefighters did not receive enough recognition for what they were doing. She decided to somehow raise enough money to have a bronze statue made in their honor.

Simmons and her husband contacted up-and-coming wood carver Paul Nixon, a parishioner of Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro, to try and fulfill their dreams.

Nixon, a native of Dublin, Ireland, who comes from a family of carpenters and cabinetmakers, has tackled all sorts of wood-based sculpting, including turning a 15-foot cedar tree into a peace totem pole for Triangle Lake (formerly Tomlinson) Montessori Elementary School's dedication as an International Peace Site in 2002.

But he had never before attempted a bronze sculpture.

Nixon gave the project some thought and, after he heard Bishop Peter J. Jugis mention his deceased father's name at Mass shortly thereafter, gained the mindset that he could not fail — especially since he too had the urge to create something positive after 9/11.

The imagery Paul decided upon was a firefighter holding a little boy with a small girl reaching back to him for security. After presenting his idea to the Simmons and their committee, they received a $15,000 contribution from Greensboro's city council.

Nixon was given the go-ahead for his project.

"This must be divine intervention — through prayer, the church, the bishop mentioning my father's name and the short period of time to receive the go ahead, among other things," said Nixon.

Providence came into play when Nixon saw the unveiling of the bronze representation of the "Greensboro Four" by Prof. James Barnhill at the Woolworth Museum. Barnhill, a sculptor and teacher at North Carolina A&T University in Greensboro, became Nixon's guide and mentor as he undertook his first bronze sculpture.

"It is almost like an out-of-body experience," said Tracy Simmons. "Everything just fell into place."

Using pipe for the skeletons of the figures, Nixon covered the frame with foam and clay, which he admits is a wonderful medium to work with since mistakes can be corrected easily.

When the clay models were finished to Nixon's satisfaction, the sculpture was sent to Carolina Bronze Sculpture in Seagrove, N.C., to be cast and finished by Dennis Carnevale and Ed Walker.

Next, the finished bronzed statue was brought to Greensboro Fire Station No. 1 on Church Street for the unveiling, which took place on Oct. 2.

With much pomp and circumstance, the Greensboro firefighters proudly unveiled the bronze figure of a firefighter in full regalia with the two children looking up at him as a hero.

Prior to the unveiling, Nixon admitted that his "nails are about to crack as the reality of it all is about to sink in. The emotions over the last couple of days have been tremendous."

Viewing his finished work, he said, "It really surpassed all of my expectations."

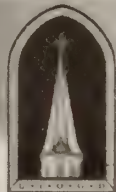

"The ability of Paul is amazing," said Tracy Simmons. "At first impression, the sculpture is so powerful and the detail looks so real. It's just amazing."

"We've got something that everyone will be proud of," said Mike Simmons.

After the unveiling, Rosemary Plyon, television anchor at Greensboro's WFMY "Good Morning Show" and mistress of the unveiling ceremonies, described Nixon's work as "unbelievable, not only for what it represents, but for one who can find the talent to accomplish it."

Nixon's work, she said, "represents hope, which can be seen on the faces of all three individuals."

Although Campbell had competed in three half-Ironman triathlons, six sprint triathlons and several marathons, the Wisconsin event was her first Ironman triathlon, a truly demanding event.

The Ironman triathlon is an arduous competition, consisting of a 2.4-mile swim, 112-mile bike race and a 26.2-mile run.

By contrast, an Olympic triathlon consists of a .9-mile swim, 24.8-mile bike race and a 6.2-mile run.

When she first started running competitively, Campbell started "small" — running half-marathons, then marathons. When she ran her first marathon, she didn't even know what the Ironman was.

"Running became boring, so I bought a bike," she said.

Soon she was riding in 30-mile bike races, then 100-mile races.

"Then that became boring," said Campbell. So she tried a half-Ironman.

Campbell considers herself to be an "average girl," and to look at this 5-foot 3-inch, 110-pound, blond 36-year-old, a stranger on the street might think so, too.

But this "average girl" endured more than 15 hours of grueling physical exertion. She also has a deep Catholic faith and a strong commitment to her students.

During the triathlon, Campbell said she spent much of the time talking to God and thinking about her faith.

Campbell admitted she had fears before and during the race.

"Doubt creeps in, and then I have to turn to my faith," said Campbell. "One way I stay focused is my faith."

Waiting alone at the starting line, Campbell asked God to put someone beside her.

"He put this woman beside me," said Campbell. "She looked at me and said, 'Smile. In the whole realm of life, this is small. God has so much more (planned) for us.'"

Fifteen hours, 22 minutes and 4 seconds later, Campbell crossed the finish line, dehydrated and exhausted, but thrilled.

Nearly 400 contestants dropped out of the race, unable to bear the 94-degree heat, high humidity and headwinds.

Campbell said people have remarked how amazing it is that she finished the Ironman.

What is amazing to Campbell is when her students understand a new concept or share something important with her.

Lori Campbell, a teacher at Our Lady of the Assumption School in Charlotte, tensely waits for the start of the 2005 Ford Ironman Wisconsin in Madison Sept. 11. Campbell finished the grueling triathlon in 15 hours and 22 minutes.

Campbell's time positioned her in 1,335th place out of 1,682 finishers. But that's not what matters to her.

What does matter is that she did her best, a concept she tries to convey to her fourth- and fifth-grade students.

"I want my children to know, 'Do your best,'" said Campbell. "Whatever it is you try ... I don't care if it's knitting."

Even though most of the competitors finished before her, Campbell still has pride in her time, because it is her best.

"I hope that I can be an example for my students," she said.

She already has served as an inspiration to her students. Two of her students competed in a children's triathlon, and she will be running a 5-kilometer race with another student.

"In the whole realm of my life, am I going to be remembered for the Ironman?" asked Campbell. "No, I want to be remembered for the person I am inside."

'Could you not keep watch for one hour?'

Understanding the Mystery of the Mass, Adoration Supplement

On the night that Jesus Christ offered the Last Supper, the first holy Mass, on the night that our Lord instituted the sacrament of the holy Eucharist, the sacrament that would fulfill his promise and desire to be with us always until the end of the world, he escorted his apostles into the Garden of Gethsemane for a time of watching and prayer.

As he was communing with the eternal Father in prayer and in agony, his apostles were fast asleep. On three occasions, our Lord returned to find his weary disciples asleep. He therefore posed this question to them, the perennial question that has echoed throughout the centuries and has revisited his disciples in every age: "Could you not keep watch for one hour?" (Mark 14:37)

Why should I make a Holy Hour? Why should I spend time in adoration of the Blessed Sacrament? What benefits await me if I sacrifice an hour of my time each day, each week?

The beloved Archbishop Fulton J. Sheen (1895-1979), who was renowned for his ability not only to spend an hour each day in the presence of our Lord in the Blessed Sacrament (for more than 60 years of his life), but also for his evangelization of others to do the same, wrote frequently about the fruits and effects of making a holy hour each day.

His autobiography, "Treasure in Clay," reveals in chapter 12 (entitled "The Hour That Makes My Day") his ardent love and devotion for spending time with our Lord each day. He wrote, "The purpose of the Holy Hour is to encourage deep personal encounter with Christ. The holy and glorious God is constantly inviting us to come to Him, to hold converse with Him, to ask for such things as we need and to experience what a blessing there is in fellowship with Him" (190).

In another book by the archbishop, "The Priest is Not His Own," Archbishop Sheen delivers a comprehensive list of benefits of the Holy Hour that is worth repeating. Since his book is written particularly for priests, let us shorten his list of "15 Reasons to Make a Holy Hour" to the following 10 reasons that we should enjoy a holy hour (daily or at least on a weekly basis).

To the question, "Why make a Holy Hour?", Archbishop Sheen gives the following responses:

— it is time spent in the presence of our Lord himself. If faith is alive, no further reason is needed.

Guest Column

FATHER MATTHEW BUETTNER
GUEST COLUMNIST

— in our busy lives it takes considerable time to shake off the ... worldly cares that cling to our souls like dust.

— our Lord asked for it. (See explanation above — Mark 14:37.)

— the Holy Hour keeps a balance between the spiritual and the practical. The holy hour unites the contemplative life to the active life; it is Martha walking with Mary.

— the Holy Hour makes us obedient instruments of God.

— the Holy Hour helps us make reparation both for the sins of the world and for our own sins.

— it will restore our lost spiritual vitality. Our hearts will be where our joys are.

— the Holy Hour is the hour of truth. Alone with Jesus, we there see ourselves not as others see us, but as the Judge sees us.

— it reduces our liability to temptation and weakness.

— the Holy Hour is personal prayer. The holy Mass and the rosary are formal, official prayers, belonging to the Mystical Body of Christ. They do not belong to us personally. But the Holy Hour provides opportunity for personal discourse.

Ultimately, love is never forced and we are never coerced into spending time with the Lord. That is why "on the night he was betrayed," on the night our Lord instituted the holy Eucharist, he invited his disciples as he invites us today, "Could you not keep watch for one hour?"

Pope Benedict XVI celebrates Mass opening the Synod of Bishops in St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican Oct. 2. Bishops from six continents are attending the Oct. 2-23 synod to discuss the Eucharist.

Eucharist is way to just society, peace, says pope simple terms, as the place where "God comes to meet us."

"God is waiting for us. He wants to be loved by us. Shouldn't this appeal touch our hearts?" he said.

But this very encounter, he said, is often hindered by people's indifference. He said today's faithful need to recall the prophet Isaiah's parable of the vineyard and ask themselves: "Is not our Christian life perhaps more vinegar than wine?"

The pope said the refusal to meet God, a phenomenon already described in biblical times, continues today in various forms. In essence, he said, human beings want to possess the world and control their own lives by themselves.

"God is an obstacle for us. Either he is reduced to a simple devotional phrase or is denied altogether, banished from public life, so that he loses all meaning," he said.

Under the popular notion of tolerance, he said, God is accepted as a private opinion but is refused a place of public influence.

"This is not tolerance but hypocrisy," the pope said. Ultimately, it leads not to justice but to a society ruled by power and private interests, he said.

The pope recalled God's "threat of judgment" to people of the Old and New Testaments and said it applies to modern Europe and to the West in general.

"We do well if we allow this warning to resound in all its seriousness in our soul, crying out at the same time to the Lord: 'Help us to be converted!'" he said.

He asked the synod to remind people that the Eucharist offers a true sense of hope, built on Christ's saving sacrifice. It helps people to reject the false ideal of self-sufficiency, he said.

Many issues

The synod marks the close of the Year of the Eucharist proclaimed by Pope John Paul II. The official list of synod members included a record-high 244 bishops and 12 priests from 118 countries.

Pope Benedict invited four bishops from mainland China to the synod, but they were not present for the opening Mass. Vatican sources said it looked doubtful that China would allow them to travel to Rome, but said church officials had not given up hope.

The synod, which ends Oct. 23, is expected to discuss a wide variety of issues connected to the Eucharist, including Sunday Mass attendance, liturgical practices, the belief in the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist, the shortage of priests, and the church's policy against reception of Communion by Catholics who have divorced and civilly remarried without an annulment.

Pope Benedict did not address any of the specific topics at the opening Mass. In introductory prayers, he asked the Holy Spirit to "enlighten, guide and inspire the synod's work and push us toward charity, harmony and service of the truth."

Heart of the church

Speaking afterward at his weekly Sunday blessing, the pope said a synod on the Eucharist was needed because the church's doctrine on the Eucharist needs to be grasped and communicated in new ways that are relevant to modern times.

He said the Eucharist has always been a lens to view the path of the church, which was founded so that "every person can know God's love and find in it the fullness of life."

The pope noted that the synod and the eucharistic year close Oct. 23, World Mission Sunday, highlighting the connection between the Eucharist and missionary activity.

"The Eucharist, in effect, is the central motor of the entire evangelizing action of the church, somewhat like the role of the heart in the human body," he said.

The pope asked for prayers for the success of the synod, including prayers to guardian angels, whose feast day was celebrated Oct. 2.

He also asked people to pray the rosary, which he said was enjoying a revival in the church, thanks in part to the efforts of Pope John Paul. The pope's mention of his predecessor drew a wave of applause from the crowd gathered in St. Peter's Square.

Cyclist Craig Fansler of Winston-Salem talks about bicycle safety with students at Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point Sept. 2 as part of the Blue Bikers program.

Catholic school fourth-graders join Blue Bikers program

HIGH POINT — As October rolls in, so will the Blue Bikers program and participating will be fourth-graders at Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point.

Sponsored by Blue Cross and Blue Shield of North Carolina, North Carolina Amateur Sports and the state Department of Public Instruction, the program creates a fun, interactive way of promoting personal fitness, health and bicycle safety.

Blue Bikers connects North Carolina children with cyclists participating in the across-the-state 2005 Cycle North Carolina Bike Tour (Cycle NC), slated for Oct. 1-8. The cyclist assigned to Immaculate Heart of Mary School is Craig Fansler, a librarian at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem.

As part of the program, Fansler visited the school Sept. 2. He brought his bike and cycle gear to show students and to discuss bicycle safety and his upcoming adventure.

During the eight-day trip from Asheville to Wilmington, Fansler will maintain e-mail contact with the fourth graders. E-mails from the students might contain questions about what Fansler ate that day, how far he traveled, what historical places he visited along the route, bicycle safety and hand signals.

Fourth-grade teacher Pat Bradley's lesson plans that week will tie directly into Cycle NC and cover subjects such as history, geography, nutrition, bicycle helmet safety, civics and social studies.

Also Sept. 2, Sherry West, a representative of the Blue Bikers program, issued pedometers to the fourth graders along with a challenge. To support Fansler during the bike trip, the class should try to walk as far as he will ride that week — 462 miles.

West showed the students how to wear their new pedometers and how to keep track of their progress on log sheets that Bradley will keep in the classroom.

When asked what he was looking forward to and dreading the most during his upcoming trip, Fansler said he was excited to see all the natural beauty North Carolina has to offer, yet he was concerned about the physical challenge of biking as many as 70 miles a day.

IHM students collect goods for hurricane victims

HIGH POINT — Fifty backpacks filled with much-needed school supplies are being sent to students displaced by Hurricane Katrina in the Gulf Coast, thanks to Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point.

Students delivered the backpacks Sept. 21 to the High Point/Thomasville chapter of the American Red Cross as part of the school's Community Outreach Program. The 50 packs, donated to the school by Costco Wholesale Corp., were filled with school supplies donated by school families.

Each pack also included a $50 Target gift card. The cards were purchased with money raised by Immaculate Heart of Mary School's student council a few weeks earlier during a Hurricane Relief fundraiser and from the Parent Teacher Organization.

The student council also has collected from school families more than 1,000 pounds of pet food for displaced animals in the Gulf Coast region.

St. Stephen Church celebrates 50 years in Elkin

Vicariate, welcomed 125 people to the celebration of St. Stephen Church, a mission church of St. John Baptiste de la Salle Church in North Wilkesboro.

"Our hands are raised in evening sacrifice ... as a gift for this church, for this community," said Bishop Jugis. "We are the beneficiaries of the missionary priests of that early era."

"This evening prayer of the church is in honor of the offering of Jesus in the garden, when he made that perfect offering to God," said Bishop Jugis, who blessed a statue of the Sacred Heart in the church's new prayer garden.

The jubilee celebration had been in the works for years, according to Sue Gutkowski, church secretary.

"Our parish has grown immensely, from four or five families at its inception to more than 90 families today," she said.

In the 1940s, the few Catholics in the Elkin area attended Mass celebrated by Franciscan priests from Lenoir above a restaurant in North Wilkesboro. Beginning in 1952, Mass was offered at an American Legion hall in Elkin.

As more Catholics moved to the area, construction was started on St. Stephen Church in 1955. Father Maurice Spillane supervised the final construction efforts as well as the design and placement of the church's seven stained glass windows depicting the seven sacraments.

Another stained glass window depicting the Last Supper is located above the front doors near the base of the small steeple of the church, which seats about 100 people.

Jean Stemmetti, one of four original members of St. Stephen Church when it was dedicated Jan. 30, 1956, has many special memories.

"My son was the first to be baptized at St. Stephen," she said.

The dedication of Elkin's Catholic church was attended by many non-Catholics, including the mayor, town officials and community leaders.

"I remember well that on the day the church building was dedicated, (parishioner) Charlie Sasher and I were asked to greet guests at the front door of the church, and show them through the church explaining the confessional (and other areas)," wrote Mary Lib Collins, one of the founding parishioners, in 1983.

"Like most people, I feel that St. Stephen's is like family because the numbers are not overwhelming," said Gutkowski.

Despite its small size, St. Stephen Church is well-known in Elkin, said Gutkowski, due to the many ministries in which the church members participate, including Life Line Pregnancy Crisis Ministry, the local food bank and Food Meals for the Elderly.

Other parish ministries include youth faith formation, homebound visitation, Bible study and Ladies Guild.

"The biggest change came with the increase in our youth group members," said Skip Whitman, who joined the church 13 years ago. "They do a lot together as a group."

"Our youth group is very active," said ninth-grader Kyle Eiswald. "We clean up the church sometimes. We help with the children's liturgy and participate in the community pumpkin festival, among other things."

The youth group also cleaned the grounds in preparation for the children's celebration of the 50th anniversary Oct. 2.

"Across the miles and across the years it is our faith that unites us," said Bishop Jugis. "We are one Body of Christ at the altar of the Lord. It is at that moment (of consecration) that Jesus forms us into the Body of Christ."

Deacon Frank Aversa dies at 67

NORTH WILKESBORO — Deacon Frank Bruno Aversa, permanent deacon at St. John Baptiste de la Salle Church in North Wilkesboro and St. Stephen Church in Elkin, died at his home Sunday, Oct. 2. He was 67.

Deacon Aversa served the Catholic Church as a deacon for 17 years with responsibilities including monthly preaching at Mass, leading Communion classes and conducting Stations of the Cross services. He also was an active member of the parish peace and justice commission, liturgy commission and pastoral council.

Outside of church, he regularly visited patients in three nursing homes, tutored children and volunteered with Meals on Wheels by delivering food and visiting the sick and shut-ins. He also had taught school in Caldwell, Forsyth and Wilkes counties.

"As one of his classmates in the deacon formation program 17 years ago, I can say he was a fine example of a man who believed and lived to the fullest the life of both a husband and a deacon," said Deacon Ben Wenning, coordinator of the permanent diaconate for the Diocese of Charlotte.

After suffering major health problems 10 years ago, Deacon Aversa regained his health through rehabilitation and perseverance, and eventually resumed his duties as a deacon. During his recovery and while on a leave of absence, he visited the sick and elderly of North Wilkesboro.

"He was a very humble individual, but he could handle any situation that might arise for a deacon," said Deacon Wenning.

Deacon Aversa is survived by his wife, Elizabeth Squyer Aversa; four brothers and two sisters.

Screenwriter's task: Sell her script using hints from her how-to book

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Catholic screenwriter Kate Wright is on the horns of a dilemma.

Last year, a book she wrote about successfully selling screenplays was published.

This year, Wright's task is to successfully sell a movie script she has written about St. Katharine Drexel.

The first step is to show it to the leaders of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, the order St. Katharine Drexel founded, and do whatever required touch-ups are needed so it meets with their approval.

The ultimate step — which is included in "Screenwriting Is Storytelling: Creating an A-List Screenplay That Sells" — is "getting money, which is equal to getting your stars," Wright said.

It's akin to the chicken-and-egg question. Finding stars willing to commit to a film gives potential investors "the reason they have to believe there's a return on their investment," she said.

Wright, who teaches classes in screenwriting and "script doctoring" for the writers program at the University of California-Los Angeles, calls St. Katharine Drexel a "shadow hero." In her book, shadow heroes "escape the sunlight. Their heroic deeds are known only to themselves, which is why they became our most beloved heroes."

The idea for "Katharine: The Conspirator Saint," as she has titled her script, came after she got a grant to write the script for a St. Katharine Drexel documentary. She wrote the script, but was so fascinated by the saint's life from her research that she mulled over the idea out loud to some of her UCLA students while at the same time contemplating writing a sitcom script.

Her students' response was: "You're not going to do that comedy. You're going to write the story of that woman."

Wright, who worked with renowned playwrights Tennessee Williams ("A Streetcar Named Desire") and Jason Miller ("That Championship Season"), said that under their tutelage she learned that "the conflict of human behavior and human ideals" is what creates the most compelling drama — "which is theologically based in what we call 'values.'"

While St. Katharine Drexel had many opponents to her work with black and Indian children, Wright said she focused on the U.S. government as the saint's primary opponent. It was the government, Wright said, that labeled the saint a conspirator, and the scenario of government interference is one that will resonate with today's moviegoers.

She says she teaches her students to look for the tried and true.

"The Ten Commandments will help you with storytelling," she said, but then to get to the next step "look at the beatitudes, and then look at the life of Christ."

Wright, a member of Good Shepherd Church in Los Angeles, confessed that as a child "I used to go to church because I wanted to hear the Gospels. Oh, I liked the epistles, too, but I didn't go for the Mass. I went for the stories."

When selling a script, the writer's job is to convince the agent, the producer, the studio executive and maybe even the actors that "it's not just a good story, it's such a great story that they (the audience) need it," Wright said.

In that sense, she added, the story of Jesus is "the greatest story ever told."

God brings lasting comfort

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Much as a rolling sea breaks through earth and slowly, then rapidly, engulfs a land, so rolled in the news of Hurricane Katrina's aftermath.

The previous evening my mother called to say she and her husband had safely evacuated from New Orleans. Then the morning TV reports showed the city had escaped the terrible damage officials had anticipated.

A few hours later came word that a levy was breached, then another, and water trickled, then poured in, then inundated the city. The neighborhood of my childhood was completely under water, my friends scattered across the South and the fate of many unknown.

The nation reeled from its greatest natural disaster of our lifetime.

What happened next was the grieving process writ large: fear, anger, despair, sorrow — healing.

In the midst of it all were the messy work and politics of an unprecedented emergency response. There was plenty of blame, ineptitude, poor judgment and calls to accountability to go around, including a lamentable lack of preparedness and neglected preventive measures.

Nevertheless, however imperfectly, the crisis is being handled with failures and successes, loss of life and lives saved.

As a democratic nation of taxpayers, Americans are involved with the official response. Our military, public officials, disaster-management agencies, law enforcement, emergency services and public funds play a large part in aiding displaced families, cleaning up and rebuilding a city, a port, an economy. We demand an accounting, we vow to do better, we seek to prevent a repeat occurrence.

But on a higher plane, amid the destruction, we care for the things of God with the gifts of God. In Katrina's wake, God's people, through various acts of loving their neighbor, brought hope and assurance that life would be resurrected. These gifts of God were courage in rescue, giving, sacrifice, healing and solidarity in meeting a wide range of needs and responding to many forms of distress.

Individuals and communities rose above human capacity to bring comfort to the suffering.

In this weekend's Gospel Jesus reminds us that we must not neglect our obligations as citizens, but remember that these are the worldly responsibilities of our time. However, the things of God are what we must offer one another to bring lasting comfort and truly save lives.

Quiet as a tomb no more: Vatican hopes crowds visit sarcophagi museum

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — By far, the Vatican Museums' most popular destinations are the Raphael Rooms and Michelangelo's Sistine Chapel.

But the museums' corner gallery housing mammoth, carved marble sarcophagi depicting equally unique scenes from the Bible has, up to now, been quieter than a tomb.

However, this early Christian funerary art gallery, called the Pio Christian Museum, is hoping to come back to life with a new initiative sponsored by the Vatican Museums, the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, and the United Bible Societies.

The permanent exhibit of sculpted stone caskets is now supplemented with "didactic panels that give a biblical reading" of the carved friezes, said Francesco Buranelli, director of the Vatican Museums.

The explanatory placards together with a beautifully illustrated free guide will allow visitors to "understand the biblical sources of inspiration" for the carvings, he said at a press conference to inaugurate the new project.

The guide, called "The Engraved Word: The Bible at the Beginning of Christian Art," merges fourth-century Roman funerary art and sacred Scripture. The 80-page booklet uses enlarged photos of the sarcophagi's biblical scenes to illustrate Mark's Gospel and the Book of Jonah.

Visitors can also refer to placards set up next to selected caskets.

A diagram shows which biblical scenes are depicted on the sarcophagus and gives related biblical passages from the Old and the New testaments.

The sarcophagi harmoniously juxtapose scenes from the Old and New testaments, emphasizing the message of salvation.

"Through baptism ... all Christians, and therefore the occupant of the sarcophagus, know they are linked to the death of Christ and to his resurrection," said Umberto Utro, head of the museums' department of early Christian art.

For this reason, the caskets are replete with biblical scenes representing the hope and eternal life that are at the end of suffering and death.

Many Christian sarcophagi contain pagan elements and references to Greek and Roman gods and goddesses.

Even the image of Christ as the Good Shepherd came from the pagan image of the shepherd, Utro said.

"The image of the shepherd, which represented philanthropy, was very widespread" in Rome's early Christian era, he said.

"Because, in the Gospel, Jesus said 'I am the Good Shepherd who will lay down my life for the sheep,' the early Christians easily recognized Christ in (the pagan shepherd) image and invested it with new meaning," he said.

Artists also saw Christ in Orpheus, the son of the god of music, Apollo, Utro said.

"Just as Orpheus tamed wild beasts with his music, his image became the image of Christ who, with his words, transformed the lives of sinners," he said.

Utro said the frequent juxtaposition of scenes from the Old and New testaments shows that the early Christians easily saw the Gospel message embedded in the Hebrew Scriptures.

In one frieze, God creates Eve from Adam and, below there is a scene in which Jesus, "the new Adam," is born from Mary, "the new Eve."

"Some early Christians had been converted Jews and so they were well-grounded in the Old Testament," Utro said.

The Pio Christian Museum's new project coincides with the 40th anniversary of "Dei Verbum," the Second Vatican Council's document on Scripture and divine revelation.

Utro said that just as the document urged Christians to "read, understand and take hold of the sacred Scriptures," the museum's initiative tries to show "that still today we need to return to the origins, the essential core of our faith as revealed in the sacred Scriptures."

The art engraved in the early Christian caskets "is biblical art, founded on sacred Scripture," he said.

"I also like to think of this museum as an ecumenical museum because all Christians from all denominations can find their common roots here," he said.

Utro said Christians today can continue to follow the road toward unity by "looking at these common roots," at these "first brothers and sisters in the faith, when the church was still undivided."

Court cases include religious rights, end-of-life issues the court's calendar to date is a case just accepted for early 2006 that raises questions about a campaign finance law that restricted the type of ads Wisconsin Right to Life was allowed to run during last year's congressional election campaign.

In between, the docket includes cases dealing with how the death penalty is applied in different states and laws affecting minors who want abortions and protesters outside abortion clinics.

After opening Oct. 3 with new Chief Justice John Roberts presiding, the court's makeup will change again, perhaps as soon as this fall. When she announced her retirement in June, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor said she would stay until her replacement is on the bench.

When Chief Justice William Rehnquist died in early September, Roberts, who had been nominated to replace O'Connor, was renominated for the chief's post

A few hours before Roberts' formal investiture at the court, President George W. Bush named White House counsel Harriet Miers as his nominee to replace O'Connor. With a likely wait of a month or more before the Senate Judiciary Committee can begin confirmation hearings, Miers probably could not be seated until at least November or early December, assuming a smooth Senate confirmation process.

Replacing a justice

At a Supreme Court briefing hosted by Georgetown University Law School Sept. 19, panelists from the faculty discussed the ramifications of O'Connor's pending departure on the court's logistics.

For instance, if early cases come down to a 5-4 vote among the justices with O'Connor in the majority, "there is a reasonable claim that they ought to hold off" on further action until after her replacement is seated, said Professor Viet Dinh.

The last time a retiring justice's replacement was not in place, at the beginning of the 1991 term, Justice Thurgood Marshall announced at the beginning of October that rather than remain on the court, as he had offered, his resignation would be effective immediately, Dinh said.

Should O'Connor do that, the court would be in the position of potentially having 4-4 splits on some cases and having to wait until the new justice is seated to reconsider how to rule, he explained.

Upcoming cases

New justices aside, this term's docket itself makes the court worth watching for those with an interest in religious rights and life issues.

Among First Amendment cases is one questioning whether members of a church have the right to use in their rituals a type of tea the federal government lists as a controlled substance.

Interestingly, the case over Oregon's assisted suicide law also revolves around the federal Controlled Substances Act, with the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops supporting the federal government in one case and opposing the use of the drug law in the other.

On Oct. 5, in Gonzales vs. Oregon, the court will review a ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that said then-Attorney General John Ashcroft overstepped his authority and undermined Congress's intentions in passing the Controlled Substances Act when he attempted to prohibit doctors from prescribing lethal doses of medicine as laid out in Oregon's assisted suicide law.

The USCCB filed an amicus or friend-of-the-court brief on the side of the federal government arguing that assisted suicide is not a legitimate medical purpose.

In another case, the USCCB opposes the government's application of the Controlled Substances Act in Gonzales vs. O Centro Espirita Beneficiente Uniao Do Vegetal. That case being argued Nov. 1 reviews a ruling by the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that upheld the right of members of the small Brazilian-based church to use hoasca in religious ceremonies.

The Drug Enforcement Administration classifies the tea as a Schedule I drug because it contains the controlled substance dimethyltryptamine, known as DMT.

Arguing in favor of the church, the USCCB said that in recent practice the Constitution's free exercise clause "now seems largely subject to the political process." It asked the court "decisively to renew protections for religious institutions."

Nov. 30 will bring an abortion law case and two dealing with abortion protesters. The court will hear for the third time arguments about the application of federal racketeering law against abortion clinic protesters in Scheidler vs. National Organization for Women and Operation Rescue vs. NOW.

The cases, being heard together, ask the court to rule on whether the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals correctly applied the Supreme Court's 2003 ruling that protesters cannot be criminally prosecuted under the racketeering law.

The same day, in Ayotte vs. Planned Parenthood of Northern New England, the court will consider the constitutionality of New Hampshire's law requiring parental notification before a minor can obtain an abortion. At issue is whether the law is constitutional without a provision allowing for minors to bypass the requirement if the pregnancy poses a health risk to the mother.

In an amicus brief, the USCCB and the Diocese of Manchester, N.H., argued that under the logic of the 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, abortion providers with no knowledge of a patient's medical history would be in the position of deciding what is best for minors.

"This court is not, and surely does not wish to be, the nation's medical board on abortion," said the bishops' brief. "Yet that is precisely what respondents invite."

Abbey monks celebrate jubilees

Hundreds commemorate achievements of three priests

BELMONT — More than 300 guests gathered in the Abbey Basilica in Belmont recently to celebrate the milestones of three special members of the monastic community.

Benedictine Father Kieran Neilson, chaplain of Belmont Abbey College, commemorated his 50th anniversary as a vowed Benedictine this year. Benedictine Abbot Placid Solari and Benedictine Father Christopher Kirchgessner also marked the occasion, each celebrating 25 years in the priesthood.

The combined jubilees attracted a guest list consisting of friends and family from all over the country, along with members of the monastic and college communities. A private reception was held on the campus after the ceremony in the basilica Sept. 18.

In addition to serving as head of the monastic community, Abbot Solari also teaches and serves as the college chancellor. Over the years, he has held a number of other positions, including dean of academic affairs and president of Belmont Abbey College.

Born and raised in Richmond, Va., Abbot Solari entered the Benedictine community as a novitiate in 1974. After being ordained with Father Kirchgessner in June 1980, he served at St. Michael Church in Gastonia.

In addition to earning his degree at Bellarmine College in Kentucky, Abbot Solari completed his doctorate in theology and patristic sciences at the Pontifical Patristic Institute "Augustinianum" in Rome.

In 1999, he was elected by members of the monastic community to the role of abbot.

Father Neilson, a native of Charlotte, graduated from Belmont Abbey College with a business degree in 1954. He joined the monastic community and took his first vows on July 2, 1955, his 23rd birthday.

He was later ordained a priest May 26, 1960 at Our Lady of the Assumption Church in Charlotte by Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh.

In addition to serving in Richmond, Va., for more than 23 years of his monastic life, Father Neilson also has held a variety of roles for the monastery. Currently, he is the abbey's chaplain and works with students in campus ministry.

Father Kirchgessner, a native of Indiana, has served the college and the monastery in a number of roles, including prior of the monastery, college vice president and dean of students, and he has worked in the registrar's office.

He currently teaches courses in theology, great books and the first-year symposium at Belmont Abbey College. He also counsels students and is frequently asked to perform baptisms and weddings for alumni of the college.

About Belmont Abbey

Belmont Abbey is a monastery of the Benedictine Order. For more than 1,500 years, men have become monks according to St. Benedict's insight.

Each Benedictine abbey stands independently with its own unique character. Although the monks of Belmont observe a centuries-old rule that is still followed in monasteries throughout the world, the abbey has its own distinct life.

Founded in 1876, Belmont Abbey is a monastery of about 20 men.

About Belmont Abbey College

Ranked one of the best comprehensive colleges in the Southeast by U.S. News and World Report and The Princeton Review, Belmont Abbey College is a liberal arts college, home to students from more than 34 states and 26 countries.

The campus consists of the college, the monastery and Abbey Basilica.

Founded in 1876, the college is listed on the National Register of Historic Places.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Again, it's about abortion

Judges are not to be politicians with platforms

In the confirmation hearings for Chief Justice John G. Roberts, many senators have conducted themselves in exactly the way pro-life leaders said they would. Abortion, the issue that won't go away, was again at the center of their concerns.

"Respect for precedent" was a code word for "respect for Roe vs. Wade," and concerns about "privacy" were really concerns about abortion. When Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont declared that he would vote for Roberts, despite many reasons that would make him vote otherwise, he explained it was because he thinks Roberts will not take away a woman's "right to choose."

What Roberts will do as Chief Justice Roberts, of course, is yet to be determined.

But we should pause for a moment to reflect on the irony of senators and other leaders arguing in public about whether Roe v. Wade is "settled law." The frequency of the question answers the question in the negative, because if it were "settled," it would hardly be the center of such constant controversy.

Roe vs. Wade itself, in fact, was on trial in the U.S. Senate a few months ago when Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas led hearings on the decision and its impact on America. The plaintiff in the case, Norma McCorvey ("Jane Roe"), is now pro-life and testified against Roe v. Wade at the hearings. (I was privileged to receive her into the Catholic Church in 1998.)

Now, of course, in anticipation of the process to fill the second vacancy on the Court, some voices are calling for a more "moderate" nominee and demanding that the president keep "balance" on the Court and not move it to the "right."

Again, it's about abortion, and it reminds me of the words of Justice Antonin Scalia: "Now the Senate is looking for moderate judges, mainstream judges. What in the world is a moderate interpretation of a constitutional text? Halfway between what it says and what we'd like it to say?"

There is no obligation, nor is it even appropriate, to seek to maintain the current configuration of opinions on the Court. That very effort contradicts what the Court is all about. It's not a legislature, and judges are not supposed to be politicians with platforms.

But in any case, how can anyone consider support for abortion "moderate," "mainstream" or even reasonable? Roe v. Wade allowed abortion throughout all nine months of pregnancy. Abortionist Martin Haskell used these words to describe a legal abortion procedure, under oath:

"When you're doing a dismemberment D&E, usually the last part to be removed is the skull itself and it's floating free inside the uterine cavity ... like a ping-pong ball floating around.

"Finally ... a nip is made out of some area of the skull that allows it to start to decompress. And then once that happens typically the skull is brought out in fragments rather than as a unified piece, the result being that sharp bony edges of the skull are exposed" (US District Court for the Western District of Wisconsin, Case No. 98-C-0305-S).

Mainstream, indeed.

At audience, pope says people meet God in celebration of liturgy

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — In the celebration of the liturgy, "God and man meet in an embrace of salvation," Pope Benedict XVI said.

During his weekly general audience Oct. 5, as bishops from around the world met in small groups during the Synod of Bishops on the Eucharist, the pope focused on the meaning of true religious faith and worship of God.

Pope Benedict did not specifically mention the synod, which began Oct. 2, but he offered special greetings to young people from several countries who had traveled to Rome for a meeting on eucharistic adoration.

"I ask you, dear young people, to place the Eucharist at the center of your personal and community life, learning to live from the spiritual strength that flows from it," the pope said.

In his main audience talk, Pope Benedict focused on Psalm 135 and its use in the church's evening prayer.

The psalm, he said, contrasts faith and idolatry.

The "living and personal God" is not inanimate, but "a living person who guides his faithful, is moved by pity for them and supports them with his power and love."

An idol, on the other hand, is the work of human hands and a projection of human desires for wealth and power.

"The fate of one who adores these dead realities is to become like them: powerless, fragile and inert," he said.

Pope Benedict said the psalm ends with hymns of praise from different sectors of the community of true believers, all united in their humble recognition of God's greatness.

The psalm's final verses illustrate that "the liturgy is the privileged place for listening to the divine word which makes the saving acts of the Lord present, but it is also the place from which the communal prayer celebrating divine love rises," the pope said.

"God and man meet in an embrace of salvation, which finds its completion precisely in the liturgical celebration," he said.

Greeting Polish pilgrims at the end of the audience, the pope said six months had passed since the April 2 death of "my dear predecessor, Pope John Paul II. His entire teaching and the witness of his life remain important and current for us."

The pope told the Poles, "I entrust his cause for beatification to your recitation of the rosary."

Pope Benedict waived the five-year waiting period normally required before the official process leading to beatification and canonization could begin. The Diocese of Rome is conducting the diocesan phase of the investigation into the late pope's life, but no timetable for its completion has been announced.

Letters to the Editor

Protesting not always a good thing

The front-page article, "Faith and Protest" (Sept. 30) was disheartening to say the least. Whether you are for or against the war (Catholics can be either), "demonstrations" now actually result in more deaths.

Each demonstration emboldens terrorists to take even more lives. It gives the thought that many Americans are not supporting troops and are in support of terrorist actions. How unfortunate so many are brainwashed into thinking that such an action would be fruitful, when in fact it is a major cause of death.

It's very difficult to understand how a march can signify a more "unified religious voice" when it's documented that only 0.5 percent were religious, and even fewer were Catholic. It is even likely that a smaller percentage were for life and against abortion. How ironic. Lest we forget, abortion kills 1.3 million innocent lives each year.

It can be even more difficult with your son in Walter Reed Hospital (as I was), along with most of the other injured soldiers that allowed us to sleep a little safer in our beds. May God have mercy on Cindy Sheehan's soul, and the rest of her followers, for a highly displaced priority on human "life."

A moment of grace

A heartwarming story of forgiveness

Imagine being in your car, peacefully driving, when suddenly something rock-hard shatters your windshield, hits you and breaks nearly every bone in your face.

It turns out that the "weapon" was a frozen turkey, hurled from the rear window of a speeding car by a teenage college student out for a joyride with friends.

That's what happened last November to Victoria Ruvolo, a 44-year-old office manager, on a road in the town of Riverhead on Long Island.

She could have been killed, and she could have had brain damage. Surgeons had to rebuild her face using metal plates and screws. But remarkably, she recovered and within a few months was back on her own and working again.

But that's not the real story. It's what happened the following August in court that makes this a tale to remember. The boy who threw the turkey, 19-year-old Ryan Cushing, who suffers from impaired vision, was indicted on a first-degree assault charge and could have faced up to 25 years in prison.

And then Ruvolo stepped in.

She saw Cushing for the first time coming out of the courtroom. He stopped, choking and crying as he tried to apologize to her.

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO

"For an intensely emotional few minutes, Ruvolo alternately embraced him tightly, stroked his face and patted his back as he sobbed uncontrollably," wrote a New York Times reporter.

As the young man kept saying, "I'm sorry, I didn't mean it," the woman he could have killed repeated, "It's OK. It's OK. I just want you to make your life the best it can be."

Then, at Ruvolo's insistence, prosecutors agreed to a plea bargain for Cushing, giving him six months in jail and five years' probation instead of 25 years in prison.

One man later said that in his 30 years as a prosecutor "he had not seen such a forgiving victim."

Much has been written about forgiveness. I, too, have devoted time and words to sharing the process I had to go through to be able to forgive the murderer of my son and his wife.

I would be asked: Is forgiveness possible when crime shatters a family? It took time, but the day came when I could honestly say "yes."

In that time I learned much about what makes forgiveness so difficult. In a word: anger.

I soon saw the light and the truth of what anger could do to me, and that underscored the need to forgive. I was giving up freedom and the ability to get on with good work for that phony, but popular, belief that we are justified in wanting to "get even."

And so I learned that forgiveness begins with letting go of the anger. When this is done, freedom returns. We can go to the next stage of forgiveness, which is to pray for the one who has hurt us and remember that this person is also a child of God.

I think this is what Ruvolo also believed.

The New York Times actually wrote an editorial about Ruvolo, titling it "A Moment of Grace." Their words were touching:

"Given the opportunity for retribution, Ms. Ruvolo gave and got something better: the dissipation of anger and the restoration of hope, in a gesture as cleansing as the tears washing down her damaged face, and the face of the foolish, miserable boy whose life she single-handedly restored."

What a gift she gave! God bless her!

St. Malachy's prophecy

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. Since the death of Pope John Paul II, I have heard several times on television and in the newspapers about the prophecy of St. Malachy, an Irish bishop. The reports say he foretold much about the popes after his time. According to him, there will be only one more pope after Benedict XVI, and then the end of the world.

What does the Catholic Church have to say about this? (Illinois)

A. As one might expect, the Catholic Church has nothing to say about it.

St. Malachy was one of the most prominent churchmen of Ireland of the Middle Ages. Archbishop of Armagh from 1129 to 1148, he is the alleged author of the "Prophecies of Malachy," which had widespread notoriety especially in the 17th and 18th centuries.

The prophecies claim to give a brief, often bizarre characterization of the name or the papacy of possibly 111 successors of Pope Celestine II (died 1144), ending with Peter II, who will "feed his flock in many tribulations in the final persecution of the Holy Roman Church." They're the kind of novelty that some people find fascinating, and they resurface every time a pope is elected or dies.

The prophecies are an obvious forgery. First of all, they do not appear anywhere until 400 years after Malachy's death, in a 1595 Venice publication called Lignum Vitae. For the period from 1143 to 1590, the "prophecies" obviously rely on readily available information about the names, homes and lives of intervening popes.

Beginning in 1590, however, when Gregory XIV was elected, the predictions become impossibly obscure and ambiguous. The prophecy was not written by St. Malachy or anyone else in his time. Some may find it entertaining and an exercise in unhistorical enigma solving, but it is a 16th-century hoax.

Before readers begin asking where to get copies, they can be found on the Internet at Catholic-Pages.com at the link to Prophecy of St. Malachy. Unfortunately, the site seems to give far more credit and credibility to the prophecies than they deserve.

A free brochure in English or Spanish, answering questions Catholics ask about baptism practices and sponsors, is available by sending a stamped, self-addressed envelope to Father John Dietzen, Box 3315, Peoria, IL 61612.

Questions may be sent to Father Dietzen at the same address, or e-mail: jjdietzen@aol.com.

The big deal about freedom

Many can't appreciate the cost involved

"What's the big deal about freedom? Most countries are free these days, right? It's not as if it's anything special."

These sentiments, spoken by a high school freshman, got me thinking. The kid has read history books and memorized facts, but perhaps it takes personal stories for us to really understand. At least it did for me.

It all started with an elderly man at the post office.

I was writing a series of newspaper articles profiling extraordinary people in my community. I was always on the lookout for interesting subjects, so when I stopped at the post office one day and noticed a POW license plate out front it piqued my curiosity.

I entered the tiny post office where one lone customer, a man perhaps in his late 70s, was buying stamps from the cheery woman behind the counter.

"Excuse me, sir," I began, "is that your POW license plate?"

The gentleman stood up very straight, thrust his achy shoulders back with pride and replied, "Why, yes, it is."

"May I ask where you served?" I asked.

That's all it took.

Before my eyes this elderly gentleman was transformed into a 19-year-old GI in the Battle of the Bulge in 1944. Stories poured out about being captured and brought to Dresden, Germany, during the bombing, being forced to pile dead bodies onto railroad ties and living in Slaughterhouse Five with fellow POW Kurt Vonnegut.

He told about a buddy who was shot for stealing a can of beans and about another POW who starved to death because he refused to steal.

"Hunger and stealing were a way of life," the gentleman explained to me. "That guy wouldn't do it."

After the war, this now-elderly man visited the parents of the GI who had starved.

"I think it was the hardest thing I ever had to do in my life, to tell parents that their son was dead because he wouldn't steal," he said.

The POWs continued the grisly task of moving dead bodies out of the rubble until they were abandoned near the Russian Front as Germany prepared to surrender.

Several prisoners managed to steal a German command car and drive it to safety behind American lines. They were flown to France and hospitalized for malnutrition, dysentery and chronic hepatitis.

Eventually the gentleman returned home where he tried to return to normal life, but effects of the war lingered.

"One time driving home in a thunderstorm, I tried to push my wife under the seat," he explained.

Another time when a sudden thunderstorm erupted in the middle of the night, his wife recalls being shoved under the bed.

Little was known about post-traumatic stress syndrome, so returning POWs tried to pretend the war never had happened and move on. It was decades before this man finally joined a group of former POWs to talk about his experiences.

They encouraged him to tell others about his wartime years and the price he paid for our freedom.

And so he did, back at the post office. Time quietly halted as the gentleman told his stories. I listened, trying to sear the images into my memory.

I don't know how long I stood there. I do know that when I left the post office that day I was proud to be an American, thankful for our freedom and keenly aware that it comes at a high cost.

That's the big deal about freedom.

Church in North Wilkesboro

Father John Hanic

ELKIN — In the late 1940s, the five Catholic families in Elkin attended Masses above a restaurant in North Wilkesboro. Franciscan priests from Lenoir ministered to Catholics from both towns until St. John Baptiste de la Salle Church was established in North Wilkesboro in 1952.

The same year St. John Baptiste de la Salle Church opened its doors, arrangements were made to hold Sunday Mass in the old American Legion Hut in Elkin.

"The hut was not insulated and summer brought the worst of heat to endure," Mary Lib Collins, one of the earliest parishioners of St. Stephen Church, wrote in 1983. "Sunday finery wilted and children were pathetically restless and uncomfortable."

"Winter brought the opposite problem," said Collins. "In the center (of the room) sat a big oil heater. Those who hovered around it too closely were too hot; those who did not shivered from the cold. In spite of the early difficulties, we were proud and grateful to have a place for Mass in our town."

Throughout the 1950s, a slow but steady stream of Catholics added to the Catholic population of Elkin.

The early Catholics in Elkin were instrumental in the gradual acceptance of Catholics in the community. Elkin is a small community and at that time, Catholics were still "strange" there but managed to earn the respect and trust of their neighbors and community leaders.

The children were instructed by two Sisters of St. Joseph, who came Saturdays from St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem. Parishioners later served as catechists, having been instructed by two women religious from Statesville.

In the spring of 1955 construction of St. Stephen Church was started. The land on which the church was built was purchased from Chatham Manufacturing Company for $1.

The first Mass at St. Stephen Church was held in late 1955, and the church was officially dedicated Jan. 30, 1956. Whether from curiosity or true interest, townspeople overwhelmed the church on the day of the dedication. The event attracted the mayor, town officials and community leaders as well as average citizens.

As St. Stephen Church entered its third decade, the number of parishioners continued to flourish spiritually and became more active in the Elkin community.

As the parish population grew, so did its clubs and organizations, including Knights of Columbus, youth groups, Bible study and Ladies Guild.

The parish's community outreach programs include Communion and visitation to the homebound, meal delivery to the elderly, babysitting for the Pregnancy

Crisis Center, financial support of Habitat for Humanity, supporting a food pantry, a Christmas Angel Tree and sponsoring a literacy group.

On Oct. 1, 2005, St. Stephen Church commemorated its 50th anniversary with a Mass celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis, followed by a dinner at the Yadkin Valley Senior Center in Jonesville.

As for the future, the mission church sees a need for more space as the Catholic community grows. A small church with a big heart, they will continue to spread the good news of Christ in all that they do.

Pen Pals for Peace connects local students to Catholic Palestinians

CHARLOTTE — Students at St. Matthew School in Charlotte are taking the first small steps toward building a bridge between the cultures of America and the Middle East.

The 114 fifth-graders will be connected with Catholic Palestinian children in Jerusalem and Bethlehem through "Pen Pals for Peace," a correspondence exchange program begun by Mel Lehman and Frank Lalley, two peace and social-justice advocates from New York City.

"The goal of the program is to get these dear children, as part of their Christian faith, to learn about another dear Christian child in another part of the world," said Lehman. "(Children in Israel) seem so foreign, but they're people just like us."

HOLY CARD COLLECTOR

Santa Barbara City College professor Julie Ann Brown displays a few of the antique holy cards from her collection. She has amassed some 100,000 religious cards — some of which can be seen and downloaded from her Web site, www.holycards.com.

California woman on mission to preserve 'God's calling cards'

LOS ANGELES (CNS) — Santa Barbara City College marketing and e-commerce professor Julie Ann Brown is the Internet go-to person for holy cards.

Brown, 45, is on a mission to preserve and share what she calls "God's calling cards," lovingly made more than 75 years ago by European nuns and clergy.

"My quest remains the same: to spare and share the beautiful holy images from those who have loved and lived before us," said the Catholic mother of two college students.

Visitors to Brown's Web site, www.holycards.com, can e-mail a free virtual holy card to friends.

During a 1996 shopping trip to an antique mall, Brown happened upon a collection of holy cards, similar to the ones she had enjoyed buying as a child.

"It was my collection of penny holy cards purchased after Mass that brought the Scriptures alive to me," she said.

After learning from a graphic arts teacher how to scan and digitally preserve the antique holy cards, which are royalty-free because copyright law classifies them as being in the public domain, Brown decided to post her growing collection on the Internet.

She called her business Chant Art, combining her love of Gregorian chant with the "visual prayer" of holy cards.

According to Brown, holy cards were considered Catholic "people's art" that was affordable and easily transportable in pockets or prayer books. Brown's collection contains hand-cut and hand-punched paper lace cards dating from the 1600s to the 1800s. They were often made by cloistered nuns as a way to inspire the faithful who could not afford expensive illustrated prayer books.

Brown estimates she spent close to $150,000 amassing her collection, which also includes images from prayer books.

"Time is running out for most antique paper," noted Brown. "Modern technology is a part of God's plan to help not only with remembering the past but creating future possibilities that at this time we cannot imagine."

People have used the 4,000 images on Brown's site to create personalized holy cards, baptismal and wedding announcements, needlepoint patterns, coloring books and religious education materials.

The Vatican used one of Brown's images on a banner to celebrate the feast of St. Cornelius. The Hallmark Channel recently used an image of St. Hildegard of Bingen.

Besides continuing to add images to her Web site, Brown plans to create religious clip art from 19th-century Catholic and Christian European books and booklets.

"This project of collecting, preserving and providing Christian art will take the rest of my life to complete — it's my minivocation," said Brown.

Church official urges hurricane school aid be distributed efficiently

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Getting federal aid to schools affected by the hurricanes in the Gulf Coast region should not be hindered by the way the funds could be dispersed, said the education secretary for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

In an Oct. 5 letter to the House Education and the Work Force Committee and the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pension Committee, Dominican Sister Glenn Anne McPhee expressed "significant reservations" about recent discussions by members of Congress stipulating that any aid given to private schools be distributed through public school districts following the model of how federal funds are distributed in the No Child Left Behind legislation.

"The hurricanes did not distinguish between public, private or religious schools at any level," said Sister McPhee.

The USCCB official noted that if funds to private schools are issued by public school districts, private schools in need might not get the help they need before the end of the school year.

"Aid needs to reach schools in the most expeditious manner," she added, noting that requiring school administrators to go through a long consultation process to get funds would be "unfair and unrealistic."

Sister McPhee said Catholic school officials in the two areas most affected by the storms, Louisiana and Texas, have told her that a lengthy procedure for dispersing funds would be totally unresponsive to their immediate and pressing needs.

As of Oct. 7, no bills had yet been crafted specifying how to distribute aid to schools in the hurricane regions other than the initial legislation introduced by Sen. Michael Enzi, R-Wyo., and Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., which did not include aid to Catholic and other religious schools.

Pope urges swift, generous response to South Asian earthquake

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI called on the world community to be "swift and generous" in its help to South Asian countries overwhelmed by an earthquake that left tens of thousands of people dead and tens of thousands more injured.

The magnitude 7.6 earthquake hit Pakistan, India and Afghanistan Oct. 8, and officials said the death toll could top 40,000.

Pope Benedict said "it was with deep sadness" that he learned of the earthquake that caused "great damage and loss of life."

After praying his Oct. 9 noonday Angelus with the faithful gathered in St. Peter's Square, he commended "to God's loving mercy all those who have died" and expressed his "deepest sympathy to the many thousands who are injured or bereaved."

Health and Cultural Fiesta will take place at Our Lady of Grace Church, 2205 West Market St., Oct. 23, 3-6 p.m. The fiesta will offer free medical screenings including cholesterol, blood sugar, blood pressure, eye exams, hearing exams and child safety, along with food, music and dancing. Beatified German cardinal 'feared God more than man,' pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — German Cardinal Clemens von Galen of Munster, an outspoken critic of Adolf Hitler's regime, "feared God more than man," Pope Benedict XVI said moments after the cardinal was beatified.

"All of us, but especially we Germans, are grateful that God gave us this great witness of faith who shined the light of the truth in dark times and demonstrated the courage to resist tyranny," the pope told German pilgrims Oct. 9.

Cardinal von Galen, who served as bishop of Munster from 1933 until his death in 1946, was beatified in St. Peter's Basilica during a Mass celebrated by Cardinal Jose Saraiva Martins, prefect of the Congregation for Saints' Causes.

At the end of the Mass, Pope Benedict entered the basilica, praying before the cardinal's relics and greeting the thousands of pilgrims who participated in the beatification of the cardinal, known as the "Lion of Munster" for his defense of the church under Nazism and his denunciations of Hitler's racial policies and of the regime's program of medical experimentation on the sick and handicapped.

Pope Benedict said Cardinal von Galen's courage was particularly remarkable at a time when "even strong people demonstrated weakness and cowardice."

The cardinal, he said, drew strength "from faith, which showed him the truth and opened his eyes and heart because he feared God more than man."

The pope also spoke about the cardinal during his midday Angelus address to thousands of people gathered in St. Peter's Square.

"In the name of God, he denounced the neopagan ideology of national socialism, defending the freedom of the church and human rights which were being seriously violated, protecting the Jews and the weakest individuals, whom the regime considered garbage to be eliminated," the pope said.

Pope Benedict said the message of Cardinal von Galen's life, a message still valid today, is: "Faith cannot be reduced to a private sentiment, perhaps to be hidden when it becomes uncomfortable, but requires consistency and bearing witness — including publicly — on behalf of man, justice and truth."

In his homily during the Mass, Cardinal Saraiva Martins said Cardinal von Galen's courage came from celebrating Mass and adoring Christ present in the Eucharist.

"In contrast to the deafening sound of military music and the empty phrases coming from the loudspeakers" of the Nazi rallies, he said, Cardinal von Galen let the silence of the Eucharist speak.

"In the Lord present sacramentally in the eucharistic bread, apparently defenseless and difficult to recognize, he found the strength and nourishment which alone can satisfy the human desire for life in a lasting way," Cardinal Saraiva Martins said.

ARE YOU BEING CALLED TO THE HARVEST?

Then he said to His disciples, "The harvest is abundant but the laborers are few; so ask the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers for His harvest." (Mt 9:37)

I am praying that you will join me in responding to our Lord's request for more "laborers" in harvesting the abundant fruit to be found at Belmont Abbey College. Over 125 years ago the Benedictine Monks came south in response to God's call to begin His work in the vineyard of North Carolina.

He is calling you to place your hands upon the same bricks that were formed and put in place by these holy monks so long ago. I am looking for strong, dedicated, Catholic students to help realize our vision of excellence and virtue. Belmont Abbey is your Catholic College and God is calling you to the "harvest."

Carnival o' fun

GASTONIA — Ominous clouds did not keep the crowds from having fun at the fair.

Hundreds of people attended the annual Fun Fair at St. Michael School in Gastonia Oct. 8.

"The turnout has been fantastic, especially considering what the weather looks like," said Joseph Puceta, principal of the kindergarten-through-eighth-grade school.

"It's been crowded since early morning, and it will continue like this throughout the day," said Father James Solari, pastor of St. Michael Church.

The Fun Fair featured a number of activities for kids, including a dunking booth, climbing wall, face painting, dance music, food and rides. For adults, there was bingo, pottery and jewelry for sale, and hundreds of items in the live and silent auctions.

"This is a community-wide event that was taking place when I was pastor here 25 years ago," said Father Solari. "The kids love it, and the parents get to volunteer and enjoy the camaraderie of working together. It's a good spirit builder."

"There has been a tremendous amount of parishioner support," said Puceta. "The parishioners and parents (of students) came out in droves to help out. And there are lots of alumni here."

The fair builds community awareness for the school and raises needed educational funds.

"We're very grateful for the help the people give us," said Father Solari.

Asheville Catholic students raise funds for cystic fibrosis

ASHEVILLE — As pre-kindergarten students at Asheville Catholic School gathered outside early Sept. 29, the sun broke through the clouds, adding to their exuberance.

The class, joined by their second-grade reading buddies, was outside for a march to raise funds for the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation, a donor-supported, nonprofit organization devoted to finding therapies — and eventually a cure — for cystic fibrosis.

Cystic fibrosis is an inherited disease that most commonly affects breathing and digestion in children and adults.

After the students chose musical instruments, mostly maracas and tambourines, assistant teacher Robin Brooks gave them the start signal to begin their 15-minute march to music. The class raised $501.

The fundraiser was in conjunction with the students' study of health and nutrition, which included learning about cystic fibrosis and how the disease affects children. The March of Dimes, an organization devoted to improving the health of babies by preventing birth defects, provided audiotapes about the disease.

"They learned how children can suffer from cystic fibrosis, and they were very willing to march and raise money for research," said Jennifer Palmer, pre-kindergarten teacher. "I'm very proud of them."

war-torn Middle East. He also explained to the students how the pen pal program works.

Students participating in the program first will write a generic letter to a child living in Israel. Lehman will hand-deliver the letters to Catholic schools, and pen pals will be matched according to gender. After they are matched, the students will write to their pen pals several times a year.

The program is considered part of the classes' religious education, and through it they will learn about the history and culture of the Holy Land.

Only about 600,000 Christians live in Israel, a nation whose population is 6.7 million. Within the Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem there are 77,000 Catholics and 166 Catholic schools. The patriarchate includes the Palestinian Territories, Israel, Jordan, Cyprus and southern Lebanon.

"The Christians over there feel forgotten," said Lehman. "They're grateful for these students, who want to get to know them."

Lehman and Lalley, who have been friends for many years, developed Pen Pals for Peace based on another project Lehman had created involving Iraqi children who were isolated due to United Nations-imposed economic sanctions.

Pen Pals for Peace was kicked off during Christmastime 2004 at four New York City Catholic schools.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, Pen Pals for Peace has received support from the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem. The order is a philanthropic organization that works to promote and protect the Catholic faith in the Holy Land.

Alice Cella, regional representative of the order for the Diocese of Charlotte, initiated the process of beginning the project in the diocese and orchestrated the sponsorship of the Order of the Holy Sepulchre.

Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor of St. Matthew Church and a Knight of the Holy Sepulchre, also assisted with the establishment of the Pen Pals for Peace program at the school.

Other support has come from Catholic Charities, Catholic Relief Services and the Catholic Near East Welfare Agency.

During his slide presentation to the St. Matthew students, Lehman explained that Christian children in Israel live in a war zone; communicating with American students encourages them by letting them know other people care about them.

"I'm excited (about Pen Pals for Peace), because I want to know about other people around the world," said student Marina Malak, whose parents are Egyptian. She was eager also to practice her Arabic.

Lehman explained that the children in the Holy Land speak and write both Arabic and English. An added bonus of the program is that they will be able to practice their English with American students.

"I'm going to ask them what it's like there, and tell them what it's like here," said student Sean Balburnie. Sean's mother, Jean Balburnie, is a Lady of the Holy Sepulchre and is helping to coordinate the Pen Pals for Peace program at St. Matthew School.

YEAR OF THE EUCHARIST

ALLIANCE WITH GOD

U.S. cardinal says sin causes people to break bonds with God, others

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — When people sin, they break the bonds of friendship with God and with their brothers and sisters, which is why penance and reconciliation are needed for an honest participation in the Eucharist, said U.S. Cardinal J. Francis Stafford.

The cardinal, head of the Apostolic Penitentiary, a Vatican court dealing with the sacrament of penance and matters of conscience, was one of several U.S. and Canadian prelates addressing the world Synod of Bishops Oct. 3-4.

The Oct. 2-23 synod was convoked to discuss the Eucharist. The Vatican released summaries of all the bishops' talks and provided briefings with fuller quotations from the speeches.

While the church recognizes itself as the community of those redeemed, saved and reconciled with God through Jesus, Cardinal Stafford said, the church also recognizes that each of its members is tempted by sin and in need of reconciliation.

"To renew the alliance of friendship with God is not just an intimate decision made by the Christian penitent, but it requires a sign recognized in and by the church community in the person of the minister, because the sin has broken the bonds of friendship with the Lord and with the church," he said.

Bishop Gerald Wiesner of Prince George, British Columbia, urged the synod members to examine ways to ensure that Catholics fully and actively participate in the Mass with an understanding of what they are celebrating. The bishop said ongoing education for children and adults is needed, but so is attention to the rites and prayers used at Mass.

Participation is a right and duty, he said, and that is unlikely to occur if the language of the translations of prayer texts is an antiquated or artificial form of the local language.

A key for improving devotion to the Eucharist, said Father Mark Francis, superior general of the Viatorians, is to improve the way it is celebrated.

"Rather than simply blame our Catholic people's lack of faith and the secularization of society for the small percentage who attend Mass in many countries, we also need to acknowledge with sadness that bad preaching and poorly prepared and poorly executed eucharistic celebrations sometimes drive good people away from the church," he said.

Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia spoke about the theological significance of the Eucharist in relation to the Trinity. It is within the Trinity, particularly in the relationship between the Father and Son, he said, that "we find the deepest explanation of the Eucharist, especially as a sacrifice — a sacrifice renewed in the Eucharist."

"Christ's love for us and the love of the Father who sent his Son into the world to redeem us explain to a great extent the Eucharist," the cardinal said.

But while people recognize the Eucharist as Christ's sacrifice of love for them, they tend to overlook Christ's sacrifice as his supreme act of love for the Father and the resurrection as the Father's response of love, Cardinal Rigali said.

Bishop Donald W. Wuerl of Pittsburgh, an expert on religious education, urged the synod members to take a holistic approach to catechesis on the Eucharist and social and moral issues.

The highly secularized cultures of many countries make it difficult to help people grasp the ideas of transcendence and the meaning of the sacraments, revelation, grace and spiritual transformation, Bishop Wuerl said.

Catechesis, particularly on moral and social justice issues, he said, must not be disconnected from the heart of the Catholic faith: the death and resurrection of Christ and participation in it through the Eucharist.

Bishop Wuerl said not all the news about modern believers is bad news.

Many young people, he said, have a sense that "the secular, material world does not provide them sufficient answers for their lives. There is a hunger for God and the things of the Spirit, but it needs to be encouraged, informed and directed."

Catholics must emphasize penance, Communion

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Catholics need to give the same importance to the sacrament of penance as they do to the sacrament of the Eucharist if they are to deepen their relationship with Christ and the church, said a member of the Synod of Bishops.

Lithuanian Bishop Rimantas Norvila of Vilkaviskis said Oct. 4 that the Synod of Bishops on the Eucharist "must give relevance to the need for the sacrament of reconciliation" or penance.

The same day, other synod members discussed the issue of keeping the Eucharist sacred, according to information on the speeches released by the Vatican.

In his speech, Bishop Norvila urged the synod's participants to rediscover the gift of the sacrament of reconciliation in "a new light."

The church needs to renew its practice of offering spiritual direction and penance, Bishop Norvila said in his written text. Priests also should be encouraged to develop "new attitudes toward personal confession," he added.

"Penance brings us close to Christ" while "the lack of penance distances us from God," he said.

In another speech, Auxiliary Bishop Lorenzo Voltolini Esti of Portoviejo, Ecuador, said there were different reasons why many Catholics today do not go to confession.

The faithful "do not believe in the efficacy of confession" or they "have lost the meaning of sin," he said. But it is also the case that a priest may not have the time to offer confession because he is "overburdened by other things," he said.

Often there is only one priest per parish and, therefore, he "cannot celebrate both the Eucharist and penance at the same time," he added.

Archbishop Jan Lenga of Karaganda, Kazakhstan, said removal of the tabernacle from the center of the church and receiving the consecrated host in the hand "cloud in a certain way the visible aspect of the Eucharist concerning its centrality" and sacredness.

He asked that the Vatican establish a universal norm "making the official way of receiving Communion" be on the tongue and kneeling. He said receiving the host in the hand should be "reserved only to the clergy."

Melkite Patriarch Gregoire III Laham of Damascus, Syria, noted during the open discussion that there were a lot of different traditions and ways of receiving Communion.

The patriarch quoted St. Cyril, who said the body of Christ is received in the hand, with the left hand making a throne for the right hand, so as to receive a king. The Melkite church usually gives Communion by intinction, in which the consecrated host is dipped in the chalice and placed on the tongue.

Synod focuses on better understanding of Eucharist

In individual speeches and free-discussion periods Oct. 3-8, the bishops addressed a multitude of topics ranging from falling Mass attendance to the degree of Christ's real presence in the Eucharist.

Pope Benedict XVI presided over most sessions of the synod but only once joined the debate. About 240 bishops were present; for almost half of them, it was their first synod.

Among those missing were four bishops from mainland China, who were invited by the pope but were not allowed by the Chinese government to travel to Rome. Four empty seats in the synod hall marked their absence.

From the outset of the synod debate, it was clear that a primary concern was the shortage of priests that makes it impossible for Catholics in many areas to attend Mass regularly and receive Communion.

One Honduran bishop told the synod that his diocese had 16,000 Catholics for every priest, a situation that required the faithful to walk hours to attend Mass. The faithful "deserve the Eucharist but cannot receive it," he said.

Celibacy for priests

Several bishops called for better global distribution of priests. Others cautiously suggested a new look at the church's rules on priestly celibacy and wondered whether married men might be ordained, at least in areas where priests are lacking.

The calls to re-examine priestly celibacy came primarily from developing countries, where church communities often go weeks or months without seeing a priest. Coadjutor Bishop Arnold Orowae of Wabag, Papua New Guinea, asked the synod how Catholics in remote villages could make the Eucharist the "source and summit" of their lives if they don't have access to Mass.

But other bishops, including some from Eastern Catholic churches where a married clergy is allowed, warned that it can be difficult for a priest to balance his pastoral workload with family demands.

Exploring the Eucharist

An emerging and complex topic at the synod was how the Eucharist is viewed and experienced — as a gift or a right, for example. Italian Cardinal Angelo Scola, the synod's recording secretary, found himself challenged by several bishops after he said the faithful have no real "right to the Eucharist."

A similar question was whether the Eucharist should be understood more as a sacrifice or as a communal meal. Traditional Catholic theology highlights both aspects, although some people felt the Second Vatican Council tipped the balance toward the shared banquet. Several bishops said the aspect of sacrifice needs more emphasis today.

Debate on this point prompted the pope to take the microphone during a free-discussion period. The Vatican did not publish his remarks, citing a need for confidentiality inside the synod hall.

The revival of eucharistic adoration also elicited differing perspectives. Italian Cardinal Camillo Ruini said the rediscovery of eucharistic adoration has helped young Catholics establish a visible relationship with the divine.

Pope Benedict XVI raises the host during the celebration of Mass in St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican Oct. 2. The service marked the opening of the Synod of Bishops on the Eucharist. At the Mass the pope said the Eucharist is the true way to build justice and create peace.

But others cautioned that adoration could become too individual a practice. Father Mark R. Francis, superior general of the Viatorians, criticized the synod's working document for appearing to give the same importance to eucharistic adoration and the celebration of the liturgy — in opposition to the teachings of the Council of Trent and the Second Vatican Council.

Father Francis and others said a key for improving devotion to the Eucharist is to improve the way it is celebrated, with improved preaching and better executed liturgies.

Other topics

The question of how to improve liturgies drew numerous comments. One bishop wanted an end to general Communion distribution at huge Masses. A few wanted a re-evaluation of Communion in the hand, saying it was seen by some as disrespectful. An Indian bishop suggested PowerPoint presentations during homilies.

South Korean Bishop Peter Kang U-il told the synod bluntly that many young people simply find Mass too tedious and boring. To increase liturgical participation, he said, pastors need to increase the sense of unity in parish life.

Mass attendance was a cause for concern. Archbishop Agostino Vallini, head of the Vatican's top court, said low statistics on Mass participation were "hardly comforting." He said the causes were competition between the old and modern religious beliefs, growing secularization and pervasive relativism.

Throughout most of Europe, fewer than 20 percent of Catholics go to Mass regularly. But the problems of Mass attendance and church membership extend to other continents, too. Brazilian Cardinal Claudio Hummes told the synod that in Brazil — the most populous Catholic country in the world — the number of Catholics was declining by about 1 percent each year, with many lost to Protestant sects.

"We have to wonder: How long will Brazil be a Catholic country?" he said.

Cardinal Hummes, noting Protestant missionary activity, said the Catholic Church should underline the importance of missionary action nourished by the Eucharist. Several bishops agreed, with one recommending specific new Mass prayers with a missionary theme.

Other synod participants said the Eucharist must be understood as a spiritual catalyst in the contemporary world, with a deep connection to issues of social justice and stewardship of creation, for example. As Peruvian Archbishop Pedro Barreto Jimeno said, if the Eucharist is the summit toward which all creation tends, then environmental issues like climate change demand an "ecological conversion."

Politics and Communion

Another issue taking shape at the synod was politics and Communion.

U.S. Archbishop William J. Levada, prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, asked the synod to discuss how bishops deal with Catholic politicians who want to receive Communion, but do not vote in full accordance with Catholic teaching.

One response came from Cardinal Alfonso Lopez Trujillo, president of the Pontifical Council for the Family, who said the question of Communion and politics needs to be clarified and cannot be settled circumstantially.

"Politicians and legislators must understand that by promoting or defending unjust legal proposals they have a serious responsibility, and they must remedy the evil committed and spread in order to approach Communion with the Lord who is the way, the truth and the life," he said.

Theologian Monika Hellwig, 75, makes a point during a conference about Catholic politicians and church teachings at the National Press Club in Washington in 2004. Hellwig, former president and executive director of the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities, died Sept. 30 in Washington after suffering a severe stroke.

Monika Hellwig, noted theologian and author, dies of stroke

BY JERRY FILTEAU
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Noted theologian and author Monika K. Hellwig died at Washington Hospital Center Sept. 30 from a severe stroke. She was 75 years old.

She was to be buried Oct. 6 at St. Rose of Lima Parish Cemetery in Gaithersburg, Md., following a funeral at St. Rose of Lima Church.

Hellwig had just retired in August as president and executive director of the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities, where she played a role in the efforts of U.S. bishops and Catholic colleges and universities to work out implementation of church norms for Catholic higher education in the context of U.S. law and academic culture.

Before taking up the ACCU post, she taught theology for more than 30 years at Georgetown University, retiring there in 1996 as Landegger distinguished professor of theology. Just days before her death she had taken up a new position as a research fellow at the university's Woodstock Theological Center.

Three days before her death she moderated a theological forum on the papacy marking the center's 30th anniversary.

"We have lost a woman of uncommon competence and compassion, but we trust that she now is with the God she so passionately loved," the ACCU said in its death notice.

A former president of the Catholic Theological Society of America, Hellwig received numerous honors and awards for her work, including more than 30 honorary degrees.

She was the author of more than 200 scholarly and popular articles or book chapters, including a three-year series of columns on homiletics in America magazine. Among her 20-plus books are titles such as "Understanding Catholicism," "The Christian Creeds," "What Are the Theologians Saying?" "Jesus, the Compassion of God," "Death and Christian Hope" and "Christian Women in a Troubled World."

She was co-author with Michael Glazer of the Modern Catholic Encyclopedia in 1994 and of its second, expanded edition, which appeared late last year.

A plain-spoken theologian who addressed a wide range of issues hotly contested in today's church, Hellwig at times challenged church positions, especially on the role of women, but often took the role of intermediary between positions of the left and right.

She was a strong advocate of Catholic colleges and universities maintaining and strengthening their Catholic identity. She spoke often about the importance — and the difficulty — of building a shared sense of Catholic culture and identity in administrations and faculties and making that culture permeate a university's life and serve as a witness to each new generation of students.

Hellwig was born in Germany Dec. 10, 1929, but before World War II her family fled Hitler's regime, first to the Netherlands and then to England, where Hellwig grew up.

Living in Italy from 1963 to 1966, she did research and writing for a Vatican official and handled the English language desk at the Pius XII International Center in Rocca di Papa, a town southeast of Rome.

Among awards Hellwig received in addition to her honorary degrees were the Catholic Theological Society of America's highest honor, the John Courtney Murray Award, and The Catholic University of America Alumni Association Award for Outstanding Achievement in the Field of Religion.

Jesus asks much of us; we must respond

BY DAN LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Who am I, you ask? Well, I'm an admirer of Jesus, kind of an unofficial public relations adviser; a volunteer image consultant if you will.

When I hear this story again about some Pharisees testing him, I regret I wasn't able to persuade him to accept more coaching. I could have saved him a lot of trouble, if he'd listened to me and not gone too far.

Sure, these Pharisees tested him; that was business as usual for them. Me,

I would have advised him not to take it personally. They were really pretty good guys in lots of ways. They had a lot in common with Jesus — they loved the Scriptures; they took religion seriously; they believed in life after death.

So, they were a little defensive about his claims to authority, but that's understandable. Jesus did say some pretty audacious things about himself.

See, I think they were just trying to figure him out and make sure he wasn't a flash in the pan. People like these, well-schooled in the subtle nuances of law and doctrine and religious practice — they'd never have followed anybody whose credentials were suspect.

So yes, they tested him. But it was a softball question: "Which commandment in the law is the greatest?" Didn't they have a right to know where he stood?

The first part was brilliant. Who could argue with "love God with everything you've got"? If he'd only stopped there he'd have had them.

But he kept going. "Love your neighbor too," he said, like that was almost as important. And some neighbors, sure — the wise rabbi, the friendly shopkeeper, the sympathetic sister-in-law.

But think about those other neighbors — the screamers who fight all weekend, the ones who borrow your stuff and never return it, the Samaritans and the adulterous women and the law-breakers. What kind of a person would love them?

AN 'ETERNAL' LEGACY

Denver gathering opens yearlong celebration of EWTN's 25th year

BY JOHN GLEASON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

DENVER — When Mother Angelica started her work to establish the Eternal Word Television Network, "she knew the Holy Father was calling us to evangelize," said Deacon Bill Steltemeier, chairman of the Alabama-based network.

"Every challenge has been met head-on. We are who we are, we tell the truth and we're in union with the Holy Father. We love the Blessed Mother and the Eucharist and that's it," he said.

The deacon made the comments during a two-day family celebration at the Colorado Convention Center in Denver marking the beginning of a yearlong celebration of EWTN's 25th year.

The Oct. 1-2 conference, one of several being held in cities around the country, featured prayers, opportunities for eucharistic adoration and seminars with some of the network's hosts, including Marcus Grodi, host of "Journey Home," and Jesuit Father Mitch Pacwa, host of "Threshold of Hope" and "EWTN Live."

Also on hand was Raymond Arroyo, host of EWTN's "The World Over" and author of "Mother Angelica: The Remarkable Story of a Nun, Her Nerve, and a Network of Miracles."

To close the celebration Denver Archbishop Charles J. Chaput celebrated a Mass, which was attended by 2,000 people.

In his talk, Arroyo recalled how Mother Angelica repeatedly asked him not to sugarcoat her life so that "people can see that everything happened from God's work" in her life.

"Mother Angelica hounded me like Pope Julius hounded Michelangelo," he said, joking about the writing process. "She's the most revered and feared woman in Catholicism."

Talking about Mother Angelica's freewheeling shows, Arroyo said, "There was no script, no producer's questions. ... This worked for her, not necessarily for people like me who need to prepare."

He praised Mother Angelica for creating the first nonprofit cable network, which has become one of the largest religious networks on the planet. He called her an "apostle of risk."

"God used all the imperfections, the pains and suffering. ... He perfected that and turned her into the woman who became Mother Angelica," Arroyo said.

"This woman is a living emblem of the power of faith, tenacity and a dedication to God that knows no limits. If you can marshal those forces and throw yourself on his mercy, he will take care of you," he added.

Early days

Arroyo relayed stories of EWTN's early days, when Mother Angelica created the station in a garage after leaving a local CBS affiliate station in protest over its airing of a movie called "The Word" that purportedly denied Christ's existence.

Arroyo recalled her spiritual battle in building a full-fledged studio with no financial backing.

"She once said, 'Some people think I'm a woman of great faith, but I'm a coward who keeps moving forward,'" he said.

Arroyo first met Mother Angelica 10 years ago when he was a Washington news correspondent who was assigned to do a story on her. He said people are drawn to her because "she makes sanctity accessible."

Not long after Ted Turner put his superstation on the air in Atlanta, Mother Angelica, a Poor Clare of Perpetual Adoration, powered up EWTN's first transmitter and the network was on the air in 1981.

By 1987, EWTN was reaching 10 million homes. Four years later, it reached more than 22 million. Its programming is available on cable television and by direct broadcast satellite and is also carried by radio stations in the United States and abroad, including Canada, India, Japan and Australia.

Last year, the network hit the 100-million-homes mark. The network's monthly operating budget is $3.5 million dollars; the budget is funded totally by donations.

In its early days, EWTN programming was mostly taped; the broadcast was only four hours long. Today, the network produces most of its own programming, which can be seen 24 hours a day.

Power of faith

In late 2001, Mother Angelica, 82, suffered two strokes. The second stroke left her partially paralyzed and she has some speech difficulties. She lives at her order's cloister in Hanceville, Ala.

According to the EWTN Web site, she and some of her sisters recently toured the network's facilities and greeted and prayed with the employees.

Deacon Steltemeier, who has been involved with the network since the beginning, remarked on the variety of ages of those attending the conference. He said that was easy to explain.

"That's the power of truth," he said, "the power of God's love. If you and I become holy and follow God's will in our life, you're attractive to everyone. Look at Mother Teresa or Mother Angelica — they attracted all ages, all people of faith."

Contributing to this story was Bill Howard.

Be cautious of 'Christmas'

Jack Hourigan (left) and Andrew May star in "Christmas at Maxwell's," in which a wine merchant copes with the cancer-related illness of his wife. While they raise their two children and struggle with profound guilt about the past, an elderly nursing home resident changes their lives at Christmastime in this Ohio-set tale.

Inspired by personal experience, director-writer William Laufer (who also plays a priest) has made a heartfelt film with admirable messages about God's forgiveness, the strength of family and being a good Samaritan. The film features a touching conclusion, but it is handicapped by languid pacing, an episodic script and mostly colorless performances, except for a reasonably convincing Hourigan.

Mild profanity, crass expressions, mild sexual innuendo and mature thematic material. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested.

ing officer for Charlotte Center City Partners, served as the dinner's master of ceremonies. Quinn, who will be the parade's first female grand marshal, received last year's Irishwoman of the Year. Charlotte Mayor Pat McCrory received last year's Irish Hall of Fame Award.

Nomination requests for the various awards were submitted to the various Irish American and Irish-Catholic organizations around Charlotte.

"We received so many letters recommending Father Sheridan for the Irish Hall of Fame Award. It was unanimous support," said Linda Dyer Hart, who organizes the dinner and the parade.

"His Irish heritage has always been important to him," said Msgr. Bill Pharr, a retired priest of the Diocese of Charlotte who introduced Father Sheridan.

"He has a great love of the land, evident in his farm in Hickory, which is surrounded by an Irish wall with a Celtic cross," said Msgr. Pharr.

Father Sheridan, whose parents emigrated from Ireland, also has organized and led a number of tours to Ireland over the last several years.

"The tours are a combination of Irish culture and religious aspects," he said.

Father Sheridan said the St. Patrick's Day parade and Irish American Awards Dinner are great events for the entire community.

"The number of participants increases because of the awareness of Irish heritage," he said. "We have a lot of people in this area with Irish and Scottish backgrounds."

Two hundred people attended the awards dinner and at least 200 people have already applied to march in the upcoming parade, said Hart.

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, state security ministry agents kept watch on him," the Bild am Sonntag weekly reported Oct. 2.

The newspaper also noted that one agent "wrote with concern that, as congregation prefect, he would have an influence on the growth of anti-communist attitudes in the Catholic Church, especially in Latin America."

The tabloid, which was given exclusive access to archives covering two decades, said a Stasi agent codenamed "Birke" had begun regular surveillance of the future pontiff when, as a priest and professor at the University of Regensburg, he visited East Germany in April 1974 to lecture on "problems of modern theology" at the University of Erfurt.

The newspaper also noted that the secret police had kept an extensive card file on the prelate and had described him after his June 1977 appointment as a cardinal as "the most decided opponent of communism in the Vatican."

East Germany's Stasi employed 97,000 full-time agents and 173,000 informers from its Berlin headquarters and 14 regional offices, equivalent to one agent for every 63 East German citizen.

Parts of the Stasi archive were destroyed after the 1989 fall of the Berlin Wall.

However, surviving sections of the agency's 110 miles of files, published in the 1990s, showed one Stasi section had at least 220 agents at various levels in East Germany's Catholic and evangelical churches and also had an agent in the Vatican who provided "exact details" of the 1978 conclave that elected Pope John Paul II.

Spies with ties

In May, Poland's Institute of National Remembrance alleged that a Rome-based Polish priest, Dominican Father Konrad Hejmo, had also supplied the Stasi with Vatican information during the 1980s, although this has been vigorously denied by Polish church experts.

In its article, Bild am Sonntag said East German agents showed "particular interest" in Cardinal Ratzinger's contacts with then-Cardinal Karol Wojtyla of Krakow, Poland. In one report, the Stasi noted that Cardinal Ratzinger, "a close friend," had "strongly supported" Cardinal Wojtyla's election as Pope John Paul II.

The paper said agents recorded how Pope John Paul asked Cardinal Ratzinger to organize help for "counterrevolutionary activities in Poland" after the rise of the Solidarity movement in 1980.

One Interior Ministry memo demanded action in 1982 "to expose with all means the hostile activity of the Vatican, to compromise especially the standing of the pope, and to criticize his behavior permanently."

A spokeswoman for the Federal Stasi Commission, Christian Booss, told Germany's Deutsche Welle news agency Oct. 3 that only two of at least eight spies assigned to Cardinal Ratzinger had been identified; one of them was Benedictine Father Eugen Brammertz, codenamed

"Lichtblick," who died in 1987.

However, she added that the Stasi had collected information "superbly well," adding that one informer, codenamed "IMV Georg," had correctly predicted in 1979 that the cardinal would be appointed prefect of the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, which happened two years later.

Key figure

One 1987 Stasi report noted that Cardinal Ratzinger appeared "initially shy in conversation," but also possessed "a winning charm." The report was filed during Cardinal Ratzinger's visit to a Catholic festival in Dresden.

"Ratzinger is currently, after the pope and Secretary of State (Cardinal Agostino) Casaroli, the most influential politician and leading ideologue at the Vatican," another Stasi spy wrote in the 1980s.

"As secretary of the doctrinal congregation, he can be more effective than the pope himself in increasingly influencing the anti-communist alignment of the Catholic Church, especially in Latin America," said the spy.

Bild am Sonntag said it applied to see the pope's Stasi files in February, under a German law allowing material on public figures to be examined with their consent.

The paper added that, after his election in April, Pope Benedict had consented to publication of the material, which was formally declassified Sept. 30.

"We informed the pope, in line with the participation procedure, that journalists had applied to see documents on his person," Stasi Commission Director Marianne Birthler told the newspaper.

Hey Sony, live in our world, not yours

OFFENSIVE AD SHORT-LIVED, BUT LEAVES MARK

Look at the photo below. After getting over the initial shock of it, you will probably ask yourself, "How could someone come up with an ad like that?"

I imagine the conversation in the ad agency must have gone something like this:

"We've got to come up with an ad for the 10th anniversary of PlayStation," said the first executive.

"Hey, why not connect PlayStation to the whole Mel Gibson, 'Passion of the Christ' thing?" said another.

Jumping into the conversation, a third person said, "Yeah, we could get a smirking kid and put a crown of thorns on his head that are fashioned out of PlayStation symbols. Then we'll have the art department make the whole thing look like a Renaissance painting."

The conference room is rocking with a surge of corporate adrenaline now when someone shouts, "How about this catch line: 'Ten years of Passion'?"

The group decides that the idea is another triumph of their cleverness and that the ad is a great concept.

Sony Computer Entertainment Inc. — the makers of PlayStation and the company that is ultimately responsible for the ad — lives by the slogan, "Live in your world, play in ours." Thus was born one of the most boneheaded and now short-lived ad campaigns in history.

Sony circulated the ad for Italian newspapers only to find a backlash from the Vatican and the faithful from as far away as the Diocese of Charlotte. Cardinal Ersilio Tonini used an understatement to describe the ad as "irreverent" and went on to note, somewhat sarcastically, "Now children can think that the Passion of Christ is a game."

In the media age, we are inundated with images and impressions that are created to evoke a response, usually to buy something. Most of these messages pass by us with little or no notice. But this ad is a grand example of the occasional sharp slap in the face of which advertisers dream.

Sony responded to the furor by withdrawing the ad. In a statement by an Italian Sony public relations official, the company said, "The intended spirit of the advertising message has been misunderstood; Sony Computer Entertainment Italy has withdrawn the campaign and will not repeat it in the future."

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

"Misunderstood" by whom? The entertainment conglomerate was probably referring to outraged Catholics such as Chris Baker of St. Therese Church in Mooresville. To him, the timing of the ad makes it even more insulting.

"It will soon be Christmas time and here is Sony, licking its chops as it anticipates holiday sales," he said. "Christmas is the celebration of the birth of Jesus, yet this ad is a mockery of Jesus. How can they be so blind?"

Amen.

Baker is asking family and friends to boycott Sony products this year. He is also looking for other ways to spread the word. If you are interested in supporting his cause you can e-mail him at chrisgbaker@adelphia.net.

The folks who really "misunderstood" this are the advertising executives who created the ad and the Sony executives who approved it. Anyone with a basic comprehension of Christianity knows that Christ's sacrifice on the cross is never a laughing matter.

Baker, who works for a large bank and knows something about corporate mindsets, says something is amiss in the Sony culture when an ad like that wins approval. Didn't Sony know the ad was offensive? Is the company equally clueless about the values of the people of Islam or, since Sony is a Japanese company, the adherents of Shinto?

Advertising is a mysterious art form that is built on the twin columns of sleight-of-hand and the maxim that a sucker is born every minute. Sometimes advertisers don't care what you think of the product, the ad agency or the corporation, as long as you stop by their tent long enough to listen to the Siren shill of the barker.

Baker, and hopefully a lot of other people, are saying, Okay, Sony, you managed to get our attention; now we are going to get yours by voting with our wallets not to buy any of your products during this holiday season.

Merry Christmas.

Married priests in the Roman Catholic Church

Q. In your column concerning celibacy several months ago, you stated that there are in the Roman Catholic (Latin) church today many married converts from other Christian faiths who now serve as ordained priests in the United States and Europe.

We have at least one of these priests serving in our diocese. What is the process that qualifies one to convert and become a noncelibate priest in the Latin rite? Is it limited only to certain designated other Christian faiths? (Ohio)

A. Catholic policies permitting married converts to become candidates for the priesthood are relatively recent and still developing. A few basic criteria, however, seem to be emerging.

The largest number of married Roman Catholic priests in our country are former Episcopal priests, members of the Anglican Communion. Their situation is to some degree unique among non-Roman Catholic clergy.

As was true in the Oxford movement during the 1800s in England, some Episcopal priests of the present generation who leaned toward Roman Catholicism felt they should remain within the Anglican tradition and work toward a reunion of larger groups of Anglicans with the church of Rome.

In time, many decided to join the Catholic faith individually, usually with their families, and apply as married candidates for ordination in the Roman Catholic Church. As Anglicans, they said, they were formed within the Catholic system, and embraced Catholic tradition and teaching.

Some of them, especially those who looked for the larger reunion of the churches, even accepted the primacy of the bishop of Rome. They maintained that both in marrying and in their movement toward the Roman Catholic Church with hopes for ordination, they acted in good faith.

The Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith accepted this reasoning, it seems. It recognized these Episcopal priests and their families as acting in good faith, and approved their reception into the Roman Catholic Church and eventual ordination as married men. They were, in other words, dispensed from the promise and commitment of celibacy.

Some married Lutheran clergy, now Catholic priests, feel that the attitude of Anglican clergy finds a parallel in many Lutherans who consider themselves "evangelical Catholics," temporarily separated from Rome and working for reunion.

One former Lutheran clergyman, now a Catholic priest, holds that this understanding is grounded in the Lutheran Augsburg Confession of 1530, and opens the way for married Lutherans to be received on the same basis as Episcopalians, with the same possibility of ordination to the priesthood.

On the other hand, people who are raised Roman Catholic are presumed to know and be committed to the present Catholic discipline of a celibate priesthood. They may choose either to marry or be ordained, are aware from the beginning that one of these sacraments precludes the other.

It seems certain that Roman Catholic policies for ordaining married converts to our faith are still developing. Probably many as yet unforeseen factors will become part of the debate, and affect the church's practice. How those factors are addressed and resolved as time goes on will partly determine which other Christian faiths might possibly be treated similarly.

The purpose of creation

Happy souls have faith in God at all times

It is not what actually happens to you in life that is critical; it's how you deal with it that is. At every stage of our development we possess the spiritual freedom to choose our own attitude and consequently our own destiny.

Do you choose happiness or gloom? The will says "yes" or "no." Grace builds on nature, therefore it is important to see that the will is the center of the personality. We may be driven by unconscious, emotional forces from time to time, but we are not controlled by them. As St. Thomas said, "If you want to be a saint, will it."

By God's grace, holiness is really possible.

Father Pierre Teilhard de Chardin, a Jesuit anthropologist, interpreted the theory of evolution as having been designed by a supreme intelligence. He insisted that the universe is a God-oriented phenomenon, identifying God as the Alpha and the "Omega" of all creation, the beginning and the end.

Thus, the purpose of the entire evolutionary process reaches fulfillment in the Lord.

We know that Jesus will come again at the end of human history. We also know that Jesus is the center of our spiritual lives. He gives meaning to life itself. Jesus is not only the Lord of every individual person, but also the Lord of history.

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

Behind the theory of theistic evolution is the belief that men and woman are works of art in progress, and that human beings are perfectible.

The church believes in human progress. We are all part of the colossal struggle to grow in wisdom, age and grace, thus advancing human history to its ultimate purpose — namely, to be happy with God forever.

Jesuit Father Jean Pierre de Caussade, the noted 18th-century writer on spirituality, said: "The secret of happiness and sanctity rests in our fidelity to the will of God as it is manifested in the duty of the present moment. ... The great and solid foundation of the spiritual life is to give oneself to God ... in such a way that the good pleasure of God, and his happiness, become our sole joy and good."

"The Little Flower," St. Therese of Lisieux, agreed wholeheartedly.

As she lay dying, she made the statement that she preformed all her actions in life with a single purpose in mind: "to make God happy." She did this by loving him and being happy with him throughout her short life on earth.

Jesus said, "I have told you all these things that your joy may be full." He wants us to be happy with him here and now.

In the past it was driven into us that we can offend God by not doing his will, but too few of us understand that we also can make God happy simply by being happy with him from day to day.

The Little Flower emphasized the importance of trying to make God happy. It made her happy to approach the spiritual life in this way. In the book "The Happiness of God, Holiness in Therese of Lisieux" by Susan Leslie, a contemplative nun from Oxford, England, we read:

"Therese insists that to be happy is an important way of showing our love for God, for he loves a happy soul, one perfectly attuned to him, content with all he wills or permits. The happy soul has faith in the loving providence of God, even in times of darkness and perplexity."

At audience, pope calls for prayers for peace in Jerusalem

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI called for prayers for peace in Jerusalem, asking that it become a meeting place free of discord.

During his general audience in St. Peter's Square Oct. 12, the pope ended his catechesis on a psalm that prays for peace in ancient Jerusalem by asking for prayers for that city today.

"We also want to pray for the city of Jerusalem that it may be ever more a meeting place of religions and peoples and really a place of peace," the pope said.

In his reflections on Psalm 122, the pope said the Hebrew word "shalom" or "peace" was traditionally considered to be the root word of the holy city's name, "Jerushalajim," "interpreted as 'the city of peace.'"

Jerusalem was not only a seat of government, it was also "the highest judicial seat" of the house of David, he said.

Jewish pilgrims would head to the city in order to settle any controversy and return home "more just and peaceful," said the pope.

The psalm traces "an ideal picture of the holy city" as a religious and social center, "showing that biblical religion is not abstract or individualistic, but is the heaven of justice and solidarity," he said.

Harmony among people is a necessary outcome from communion with God, he said.

Just as the psalmist praised Jerusalem as being "a city of compact unity," the Christian faithful must be the living stones that hold and support each other and make the church one and solid, he said.

The pope quoted St. Gregory the Great, who said each person must learn to accept and support one's neighbor and forge bonds of "reciprocal and patient love."

"If I do not exert myself to accept you as you are, and you do not work to accept me as I am, a building of charity cannot rise up among us," the pope said in reference to teachings by St. Gregory.

The foundation that supports the entire weight of the living stones of the faithful is Christ, who also "carries the weight of all our sins," he said.

The pope called on everyone to build peace by each one carrying the other, linked by "the joyous certainty that the Lord is carrying us all."

"In this way the church grows as a true Jerusalem, a place of peace," he added.

At the end of the audience, the pope offered greetings in 12 languages to some 50,000 pilgrims packed into St. Peter's Square.

Internet predators

Talking to strangers is now commonplace

Since we were little, our parents took us by the hand and told us, "Don't talk to strangers." They instilled a bit of fear in us in order to keep us safe, in order to decrease the chance of strangers hurting us.

A little fear never hurt anyone in this situation. Now in the teenage years, it seems silly for parents to resort to that old fear tactic, since a teenager is smart enough to avoid talking to strangers.

Or is it really that silly?!

Who is stylistchicky? Who is matman34? Who is ladybug46? Or wheeliefrog? Or even Kasetate?

These are screen names that pop up in chat rooms on the computer screen. But, we have no idea who types the blog beneath the name. Chat rooms and Internet surfing are areas of social life for many teens that parents are clueless about.

"Blog? What's a blog?" many parents may ask.

Teens could easily lecture their parents about Internet usage before parents could lecture them, but that doesn't answer the question: "Who is butterfly56?" We can never be sure who is on the other side of that Internet conversation since the majority of chat rooms are unsupervised.

Teens are not children. They are not ignorant of Internet predators. They have more knowledge of spam scams than their parents and elders, but sometimes the "safe zones" on the Internet are not safe at all.

Coming of Age

KASE JOHNSTUN

The revealing of personal information even in the most casual of chats could be extremely dangerous. Many Internet scammers and identity thieves need very little information to take advantage of an innocent surfer and are pretty good at disguising themselves as peers and digging for seemingly harmless information.

Predator: According to Webster's dictionary, a predator is one that preys, destroys or devours. So, according to this definition, Internet predators are aptly named. There are sexual Internet predators, financial Internet predators, fraudulent Internet predators, racist Internet predators.

All of these predators are looking for someone who'll just open up slightly to let them in, someone whom they can convince to talk sexually or meet them for a sexual encounter after they have provided a comforting voice in a confusing time, someone to give the little information needed about their parents' financial situation or banking information (teens often are tricked when asked to submit information for a prize they've won or could win), or to introduce racist garbage that devours their previous Christian beliefs.

Chances are Wheeliefrog, stylistchicky, or matman34 are good people dealing with the same issues you are dealing with or are interested in the same hobbies you are involved in: explaining why you both have navigated to the same chat room.

Still, parents have said for years, "Don't talk to strangers." But since the Internet age gives us opportunities to talk to others who share our interests, talking to strangers is a reality for many.

It's not that simple to avoid these strangers. What teens can do when entering a chat area is to steer the conversation around to college football, rock idols or train collecting. They must be smart, cautious and cold. If the conversation strays, teens should stray from that site — and report the predator.

Keep your guard up.

St. Jude Church in Sapphire Valley has served a small but dedicated Catholic community in the North Carolina mountains for the past 35 years.

SAPPHIRE VALLEY — It was 35 years ago, just before the founding of the Diocese of Charlotte, that a small group of Catholics from tiny mountain towns gathered in a local real estate office to celebrate Mass for one of the last times.

Those devoted Catholics — from places like Cashiers, Glensville, Lake Toxaway and Sapphire Valley, had big plans for the near future. They were preparing for a church they could call their spiritual home.

In the decades preceding the diocese's founding in 1972, western North Carolina was still very much a missionary region when it came to propagating the Catholic faith. People in Macon and Jackson counties met for liturgies celebrated by visiting priests in a Highlands movie house and on the sun porch of an area hotel before congregating in the real estate office meeting room.

They also traveled to Brevard, where Sacred Heart Church had been built in 1949. Highlands welcomed the construction of a church in town in 1950. But in Sapphire Valley, Catholics still depended on those periodic visits from clergy or they traveled for Mass.

By the 1960s, Sapphire Valley Catholics — considered a mission community of the Brevard parish — began speaking earnestly about building a church. Worship space became especially crowded in the summer months, when out-of-state visitors came to the North Carolina mountains for weeks and months at a time.

Father Charles Mulholland, then-pastor in Brevard, petitioned Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh on the matter, and the bishop granted permission for construction to begin. Fundraising efforts were begun by resident and visiting Catholics, as well as their neighbors of other faiths.

Two of the early leaders in the cause were Gene and Katie Howerdd, who donated the land for the church and later provided the church doors, an organ and funds for landscaping. Other benefactors followed suit, including Father Mulholland's brother, a professor at Catholic University in Washington, D.C., who arranged for architectural students to design models for the Sapphire Valley church as a class project.

One of the models, an octagonal chapel of fieldstone, was chosen for the site along Highway 64.

Contributions continued to come in from people of all faiths and greatly assisted in getting the church built and the debts paid. The groundbreaking ceremony took place in August 1971, when Father Edward Sheridan was pastor in Brevard. Father Sheridan, two bishops and the abbot of Belmont Abbey celebrated the first Mass in the new church, placed under the patronage of St. Jude, in July of the following year.

The church was fitted with an altar stone of rock weighing more than one ton, as well as statues from Germany and carved wooden doors crafted centuries ago in Spain. A parishioner, sculptor Francis Trainor, designed the Stations of the Cross, figures for three small grottos recessed in the church's outer walls and a large statue of the Madonna and Child which resides near the church's entrance.

Other parishioners donated a ship's bell and tower and funded the paving of a 100-car parking lot beside the church.

By church law, St. Jude Church remains a mission of Sacred Heart Church in Brevard. However, the church was in the ministerial care of Our Lady of the Mountains Church in Highlands from 1986 to 1996.

During the summer, St. Jude Church has between 400 and 500 people attending Mass on the weekends, while approximately 115 people attend Mass during the winter months of January through March. There are now 75 year-round households and 290 total households, counting the seasonal members. The church continues to grow as Cashiers experiences higher than normal growth for North Carolina.

In 2000, with the continued growth of the mission, St. Jude Church received permission to add a social hall to the church. Money was raised in late 2000 and early 2001 and the hall was completed in December 2002. The 4,000-square foot hall has a meeting area, kitchen, four classrooms and a parish office.

In July 2005 Father Tien H. Duong was appointed as pastor of St. Jude Church.

For 35 years St. Jude Church has served a small but dedicated and growing community of Catholics in the southern mountains of North Carolina.

SYNOD OF BISHOPS

Atlanta archbishop tells synod church needs inspiring preachers

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — The church needs vibrant, inspiring preachers and new ways to communicate faith traditions in its response to current challenges, said Archbishop Wilton D. Gregory of Atlanta.

While the Oct. 2-23 Synod of Bishops on the Eucharist grapples with concerns such as how to attract more priestly vocations or how to reach out to young people or lapsed Catholics, "we cannot change the faith of the church to accommodate one group or another," he told Catholic News Service Oct. 10 in Rome.

"But what we can do is communicate the faith of the church in such a way so that it is heard by people in a variety of backgrounds," he said.

ASHEVILLE — Shelley was 17, Catholic, unmarried and pregnant. Her life would never be the same again.

The doctor who confirmed her pregnancy told her to get an abortion. It was, he said, just "the removal of some tissue, no big deal."

Her mother agreed with the doctor.

Alone, Shelley drove three hours from her small Midwest hometown to Detroit to have the abortion in 1973.

VISUALIZING SUCCESS

The printing club, under the direction of adviser Sister Elaine George, a Sister, Servant of the Immaculate Heart, works to complete a job at St. Lucy Day School for Children With Visual Impairments in Philadelphia. The burgeoning school business was the idea of two students.

Students' idea for printing enterprise becomes big business

PHILADELPHIA (CNS) — What began as a pipe dream for a printing enterprise last December at St. Lucy Day School for Children With Visual Impairments is now a burgeoning student business.

"Big companies are asking us to make cards for them," said the co-founder of the school's printing club, Sheila McLaughlin, a 9-year-old fourth-grader who has been legally blind since birth.

"Our cards are special," added co-founder Amy Ryan, Sheila's classmate, who is also 9 and has been legally blind since birth.

"Not many children are in a business to make cards," said co-founder Amy Ryan, Sheila's classmate, who is also 9 and has been legally blind since birth.

The beauty of the cards comes from the hearts and hands that craft them.

"Visually impaired children make them, and the designs are very good, even though they can't see very well," Sheila said. "We can do things that people think that visually impaired children can't do."

Sister Mary Elaine George, a Sister, Servant of the Immaculate Heart and adviser to the printing venture, said she can well recall the indoor recess last year when Sheila and Amy drew pictures using a paint program on the school computer.

She was talking with the two about their art when they began asking one another: "Could we start a business?"

She and the girls held a meeting at the next recess and discussed the product, the necessary materials, cost estimates and profit margins.

Amy and Sheila, third-graders at the school at the time, decided to employ the fourth-grade class. All became founding members of the business's board of directors.

Although their long-range goal was to sell custom-designed greeting cards, the entrepreneurs decided to start with seasonal Christmas stickers, which they sold to family and friends. Using the profits from that venture, they started the greeting-card enterprise, peddling them at the school's St. Patrick's Day social.

From the get-go, the girls had more than pocket money in mind. When they devised their budget, they earmarked one-third of the proceeds for children's charities and one-third for product development and materials, with the last third to be divided among the club's members.

"Right up front, they wanted to give to (a) children's charity," Sister Elaine said. "I think that's why we're being so blessed with success — because of their generosity."

Their first major client was an archdiocesan organization called BLOCS, for Business Leadership Organized for Catholic Schools, which commissioned 750 personalized thank-you cards for the organization's annual fundraising gala.

Sister Elaine commended the business co-founders for their leadership, and all of the club's members for their work ethic, attention to detail and business savvy.

"They really put forth their best effort. They're highly motivated. I'm really proud of them. ... I really have done very little," Sister Elaine said. "This is the children's inspiration and motivation. They've run with it."

Senate confirms businessman as U.S. ambassador to Vatican Rooney active in Knights of Malta, charities

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Francis Rooney, a businessman with ties in Oklahoma and Florida, was confirmed by the Senate Oct. 7 to be U.S. ambassador to the Holy See.

In a voice vote, the Senate agreed to confirm Rooney's appointment along with the nominations of dozens of other people to posts ranging from assistant secretaries of various federal agencies to judges for the District of Columbia.

Rooney is chief executive officer of Rooney Holdings, which includes insurance and construction companies. He also has been active in Oklahoma and Florida in charitable and community organizations including the Knights of Malta, an Oklahoma Catholic hospital's strategic planning committee, the American Red Cross and the United Way.

He has been acquainted with President George W. Bush at least since Rooney Holdings' Manhattan Construction Co. built the Texas Rangers' baseball stadium when Bush was managing partner of the team in the early 1990s. Rooney and his company contributed or raised more than half a million dollars for 2004 Republican campaigns and the presidential inauguration.

The post of Vatican ambassador has been vacant since Jim Nicholson became secretary of Veterans Affairs in January. Rooney's nomination was announced in July. After a brief hearing to introduce him to lawmakers Sept. 19, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved his nomination Oct. 5 in a voice vote.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican assures Muslims of church's commitment

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — As Muslims prepared to celebrate the end of their monthlong Ramadan fast, Archbishop Michael Fitzgerald assured them the Catholic Church's commitment to dialogue would continue under Pope Benedict XVI.

The archbishop, president of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, sent written greetings to Muslims around the world about to celebrate the Nov. 3 feast of Eid al-Fitr, which marks the end of Ramadan.

In the message, released Oct. 14, the archbishop said many Muslims joined Catholics in following news about Pope John Paul II's illness and death in April.

"It was faith in God and confidence in humanity that impelled the late pope to engage in dialogue," the archbishop said. "He constantly reached out to brothers and sisters of all religions with respect and a desire for collaboration."

Archbishop Fitzgerald said the Catholic Church's commitment to dialogue was encouraged by the Second Vatican Council, which concluded 40 years ago.

In the light of the council's teaching, he said, Pope John Paul's efforts were "rooted in the Gospel, following the example of the Lord Jesus who showed his love and respect for each person, even for those who did not belong to his own people."

The archbishop said Pope Benedict, since his April 19 election, has made clear his commitment to continuing dialogue.

"Making reference to the conflicts, violence and wars present in our world," he said, the new pope "emphasized that it is the duty of everyone, especially those who profess to belong to a religious tradition, to work for peace."

Archbishop Fitzgerald said Catholics and Muslims should be encouraged by Pope Benedict's words and "strengthen our engagement in building up good relations among people of different religions, to promote cultural dialogue and to work together for greater justice and enduring peace."

Vatican official calls for better care of mentally ill

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — More needs to be done to help the mentally ill and to support programs of early diagnosis and prevention of mental illness, said a top Vatican official.

Cardinal Javier Lozano Barragan, head of the Pontifical Council for Health Care Workers, appealed to public health officials worldwide "to find urgently needed help" for those with mental disorders.

Many of these people are "on the streets or with their families where they cannot receive the (proper medical) help they need," he said in his message for World Day of Mental Health celebrated Oct. 10.

He asked that health and government officials make mental health care more accessible and equitable and that treatment be "in full respect for the integrity and dignity of the sick."

According to the World Health Organization, some 450 million people worldwide suffer from a mental disorder and 873,000 people commit suicide each year, the cardinal said in his text.

"Mental disability represents a true and real social-health emergency," he said, adding that it does not have enough support from existing health and governmental programs.

"In over 25 percent of (the world's) health clinics, patients do not have access to essential psychiatric medicines; there is fewer than 1 psychiatrist for every 100,000 people for 70 percent" of the world's population, he said.

Mental illness tends more often to strike those who are "intellectually, culturally or economically disadvantaged," he said.

Cardinal Lozano also said societies need "to promote healthy lifestyles that are consistent with a culture of values."

He said people cannot remain silent in the face of a culture or society that condones exploiting people and that demonstrates "continued aggression against (a person's) serenity and mental balance."

The "crisis of values" also leads to greater loneliness among individuals, breaks up traditional social structures, and discredits the support of the family, he said.

The Catholic Church always has played an important role in offering prevention and help to those afflicted by mental illness, he said.

Church-based programs and workers show that "mental illness does not create insurmountable obstacles and does not impede" building a relationship with sufferers that is based on "authentic Christian charity," he said.

Prison ministers recognized at annual gathering

HICKORY — Volunteers involved with prison ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte recently gathered for the second annual Prison Ministry Appreciation Day, held at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory Oct. 1.

"It was a time to show the appreciation of the diocese and the permanent deacons for the hours spent bringing the Lord's message and Eucharist to prisoners in western North Carolina," said Deacon Ben Wenning, coordinator of the permanent diaconate, which oversees prison ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte.

The featured speaker was John Kopec, a retired New York police officer and prison ministry chaplain, who shared how a near-death experience changed his life and brought him to North Carolina to work in prison ministry.

Mary Webb, a parishioner of St. Barnabas Church in Arden, received the John Gallan Prison Ministry Award.

Webb's involvement in prison ministry began 12 years ago, when she first began raising money for a chapel at Craggy Correctional Center in Asheville. She and her husband, Keith, initiated Prison Fellowship, a program to assist inmates nearing release to transition back into the community.

In addition to the John Gallan award, Webb has been nominated for the 2005 Volunteer of the Year award at Craggy Correctional Center.

The John Gallan award was created in 2004 by Sergio Gomez, an inmate at the Mecklenburg Correctional Center in Boydton, Va. When informed that the award was going to Webb, Gomez wrote her a letter reflecting the appreciation of inmates toward those in prison ministry.

"I want to thank you on behalf of all of the inmates and prisoners for your time and dedication," he wrote. "I thank you for being that instrument which our Lord uses so powerfully."

The next Prison Ministry Appreciation Day will be held in September at the Catholic Conference Center.

Saluting heroes

Holy Angels honors many during Spirit Week

BELMONT — The residents and staff of Holy Angels paid special tribute to heroes during Spirit Week, an annual event that recognizes and celebrates the spirit of Holy Angels, its employees and the community.

Spirit Week, this year themed "Catch the Spirit," was celebrated Sept. 11-17. More than a dozen Gaston County emergency workers and military servicemen and women were recently honored during "Patriotic Day." Members of the Belmont fire and police departments, Gaston County Emergency Medical Services and the Armed Services were treated to a reception in their honor on Holy Angels' main campus.

Regina Moody, Holy Angels president and chief executive officer, presented each "hero" with a flag created on paper by residents during hand-over-hand art classes.

The diverse heritage of Holy Angels' 230 employees was celebrated during Spirit Week's "International Day." Ten countries were represented, including the United States.

"Holy Angels is so fortunate to have incredibly dedicated employees," said Moody. "It's important that we recognize and celebrate those gifts and talents they bring to our residents each and every day. Spirit Week allows us to do that."

ARE YOU BEING CALLED TO THE HARVEST?

Then he said to His disciples, "The harvest is abundant but the laborers are few; so ask the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers for His harvest." (Mt 9:37)

I am praying that you will join me in responding to our Lord's request for more "laborers" in harvesting the abundant fruit to be found at Belmont Abbey College. Over 125 years ago the Benedictine Monks came south in response to God's call to begin His work in the vineyard of North Carolina.

He is calling you to place your hands upon the same bricks that were formed and put in place by these holy monks so long ago. I am looking for strong, dedicated, Catholic students to help realize our vision of excellence and virtue. Belmont Abbey is your Catholic College and God is calling you to the "harvest."

Permanent deacons, wives retreat to Hickory

Deacons renewed and inspired during retreat

Permanent deacons and their wives sing and relax after evening prayer at their annual retreat at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory, held October 14-16.

CORRESPONDENT

HICKORY — Recently, 70 permanent deacons and wives experienced a weekend of spiritual renewal and camaraderie on their 15th annual retreat at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory, Oct. 14-16.

"The retreat is designed to give both the deacons and their wives issues to think about and to give them time to reflect about these things," said retreat facilitator Father John Putnam, who serves as judicial vicar, pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury and vicar forane for the Salisbury Vicariate.

Father Putnam's goal was certainly met according to Martha Duca, wife of Deacon Peter Duca, permanent deacon at Our Lady of the Assumption Church in Charlotte.

"Father Putnam has brought us back to the basics as far as the liturgy and the world are concerned, including the deacon's role in it," she said. "I am also glad that Father Putnam included the wives as being an important part of the deacon's ministry."

Father Putnam reiterated several times that the deacon (and his wife) must "model their lives on Jesus Christ for the good of every person," with Christ shouldering the bulk of their ministry.

He emphasized that the deacon's principle function is to collaborate his ministry with that of the bishop and the priest, as he calls the people to conversion and holiness.

"Deacons must put on our Lord, Jesus Christ ... to clothe themselves with Christ," Father Putnam said. "This is because ministry is not about 'me' ... but about Christ and what he does in the (Catholic) Church."

Therefore, Father Putnam instructed, "immerse yourselves in the Paschal Mystery while acknowledging your weaknesses and limitations, and what it is that limits you from truly living Christ."

"I think the retreat was excellent," said Deacon Harold Markle, permanent deacon at Divine Redeemer Church in Boonville. "Father Putnam showed the role of the deacon as very positive."

"Father Putnam combined the doctrine of the liturgy with the personal, so that all of it becomes more meaningful to the life of the deacon and his wife," said Eileen Rohan, wife of Deacon Timothy Rohan, permanent deacon at Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro.

"Father Putnam pointed out that the responsibility of our prayer life should come to the fore," said Deacon Rohan. "As Father Putnam says, 'the liturgy should be like our first Mass, our only Mass, and as if it were our last Mass.'"

Women speak out against abortion

"Women are told abortion is a simple choice and are therefore unprepared for the pain and suffering they experience as a consequence of (having an) abortion," Shelley said. "We believe abortion should be unthinkable for women facing an unplanned pregnancy."

Shelley and other women shared their personal stories about abortion at a Silent No More rally in Pack Square in downtown Asheville Oct. 15.

"My mom said abortion would end my pain," Shelley said. "I'm here to tell you that it began my pain."

Parishioners from St. Barnabas Church in Arden rallied to the women's support, holding signs reading, "I regret my abortion," "Women need love not abortion" and "Abortion hurts women."

Shelley now helps facilitate Rachel's Vineyard retreats at Living Waters Catholic Reflection Center in Maggie Valley for women who have had abortions.

Telling her story, Shelley said, "brings back the pain, but you don't want other women to make the same mistake. I like to share my story with young people, because this all begins with a fall from chastity."

Going into the clinic to have the abortion, she recalled, "was like there was this little person on my shoulder, whispering in my ear, 'This is all you can do. You have no other choice.' As soon as I had the abortion, that same voice was saying, 'What a horrible person you are. You killed your child.'"

The nondenominational Silent No More Awareness Campaign holds rallies nationwide to inform the public about the emotional, physical and spiritual consequences of abortion. Silent No More organizers hope more women will have the courage to tell their own stories and end the silence that surrounds abortion.

In 1974, Mary's unborn child was diagnosed as hydrocephalic, an abnormal increase of fluid within the skull causing enlargement of the skull and atrophy of the brain. She wept as she recalled the partial-birth abortion of her baby, whom she later named Luke.

"I could have held him, fed him, sung him lullabies until he died," she said. "My hope is that soon women will not go anywhere near the thought of having an abortion. The least we can do is give a child a birthday."

None of the women who spoke at the rally said they were given alternatives.

"No one offered any other choice," Shelley said. "If I'd been offered adoption, I could find my child. If there had been a place like Room at the Inn (a home in Charlotte for unmarried mothers), I could have gone there."

Shelley later had a son. "You have this empty feeling," she said. "In psychological terms it's called the 'replacement child.'"

She said that 50 percent of abortions are second abortions. Shelley's son was 3 years old when she terminated her third pregnancy. Still unmarried, in a prison "of drugs, low self-esteem, sexual promiscuity and twice-attempted suicide," she feared she couldn't raise two children alone.

Later, while studying nursing, Shelley had a shattering revelation.

"I don't know how medical (personnel) can say that it isn't a human being," she said.

In anatomy and physiology class, the instructor explained how the egg and sperm join to become a human being.

Shelley said she suddenly thought, "Oh, my God, what have I done?"

Dr. Maureen Kennedy, an obstetrician and gynecologist in Asheville, explained how some medical personnel deny the unborn child's humanity.

In her residency training, she said, "abortion was (termed) just a procedure, someone else's choice, in which I shouldn't interfere. There is a silence among physicians and healthcare workers, too."

Kennedy described the "emotional and medical consequences" of abortion, "the long-term risks of suicide and depression, the increased risk of breast cancer."

"We owe it to all women to be 'silent no more,'" she said.

"I think priests and ministers don't talk about this from the pulpit because they're afraid they'll offend someone who's had an abortion," Shelley said. "I say to them, 'So you're going to let them sit there and suffer?' Initially the women might be angry and hurt, but eventually it will free them to seek healing and forgiveness. The hardest person to forgive is yourself."

What message does Shelley want priests to give about abortion?

"I'd like them to say it's the wrong thing to do, but that there is hope and healing and that the (Catholic) Church doesn't condemn them, that they can receive forgiveness," she said.

Shelley later married. Her husband, Rick, adopted her son. They had another son and now have five grandchildren.

Rick "spiritually adopted" Shelley's unborn children, whom she named James and Elizabeth. James would be 32 years old now; Elizabeth, 26.

"I've forgiven myself, my children have forgiven me, but I will never forget," Shelley said. "I know that I had a son and a daughter. She was my only daughter, and I didn't let her live."

Although Shelley told her husband about her abortions before they married, she had never spoken publicly about them. When the family moved to Arden six years ago and joined St. Barnabas Church, she saw a church bulletin announcement from the Respect Life committee asking for volunteers to tell about their abortions.

Reluctantly, she called the committee chair, who said that she, too, had had an abortion. Encouraged by her Respect Life involvement, Shelley went to a Rachel's Vineyard retreat.

Promoting a culture of life

Bishop Peter J. Jugis dedicates the Blessed Mother Teresa Pro-Life Memorial at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte Oct. 16. The church's Respect Life committee facilitated the installation of the outdoor life-size statue of Blessed Mother Teresa cradling an infant.

"Blessed Mother Teresa was a great witness to the dignity of all human life during her ministry among the poor," said Father Mark Lawlor, pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church. "Since abortion became so widespread in the 1970s, the Catholic Church has protected the sanctity of life."

When Mother Teresa visited Charlotte in 1995, she issued a firm warning, saying, "Any country that accepts abortion is not teaching its people to love. The greatest destroyer of love and peace is abortion."

A plaque on the base of the statue contains this same quote.

"Our (Respect Life) committee and parish wanted to have a lasting reminder that would bear witness to the violence of abortion against mother and child," said Diane Hoefling, Respect Life coordinator for St. Vincent de Paul Church. "Blessed Teresa's example of selfless love in serving the 'poorest of the poor' challenges all of us to defend human life through every stage and condition and to promote a culture of life."

"It helped me to forgive myself, to name my children and know that they are safe in heaven with God, to forgive the doctor, to (posthumously) forgive my mom," she said.

She wears a pin that many other mothers wear, with little silver figures bearing birthstones, but two of the figures on Shelley's pin are angels.

"James and Elizabeth, I'm so sorry," Shelley said at the rally. "If I'd known then what I know now, you would never have died."

Banquet benefits maternity home

Father Frank Pavone, national director of Priests for Life, greets guests following the Room at the Inn banquet, "No Greater Gift," Oct. 13. Father Pavone was the keynote speaker for the annual fundraiser, which benefits the Catholic maternity home.

STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Respect for all life must begin in the home and be encouraged by the Catholic Church, according to Father Frank Pavone, national director of Priests for Life.

Father Pavone was the featured speaker at "No Greater Gift," the 11th annual banquet benefiting Room at the Inn, a Catholic maternity home in Charlotte that offers pregnancy assistance for unmarried pregnant women and their babies, both born and unborn.

Approximately 1,250 attended the banquet held at the Charlotte Convention Center Oct. 13. Among those attending the banquet were Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte; Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin of Charlotte; Msgr. Mauricio West, chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte; Abbot Placid Solari, abbot and chancellor of Belmont Abbey; and pro-life advocate Alveda King, niece of Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. and daughter of civil rights leader A. D. King.

Last year, the banquet raised more than $160,000 for the maternity home.

During the banquet, Holy Angels was presented with the Msgr. William Wellein Outstanding Service Award. Holy Angels is a private, nonprofit corporation in Belmont that provides residential services to children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation and physical disabilities.

Creating a culture of life in today's society begins at home, Father Pavone said. This is done by spending time with the sick and the elderly and welcoming the unborn in new ways.

When people spend time with the sick and elderly, "we are teaching our children ... that this life hasn't lost its value," said Father Pavone. "The Catholic Church must sound the trumpet, because it's the Church, above all, that can mobilize people."

Father Pavone said practices such as naming a child before birth or having a funeral Mass for a miscarried child are also good ways to promote the culture of life.

Legalized abortion and euthanasia have "blunted our sense of right and wrong," said Father Pavone. "If we hadn't had some 42 million children aborted ... I don't think it would have been as difficult for people to say 'Terri Schiavo was murdered' (in March 2005)."

"The problem that (abortion providers) are facing is that you can't take the stigma out of abortion, because it's inherently so unnatural and repulsive," said Father Pavone. "They have not been able to succeed, in all these years of it being legal, to take the stigma out of it. That's why so many doctors don't want to do it."

Father Pavone also said that both pro-life and abortion advocates agree that there will be fewer doctors willing to perform abortions in the coming years.

Since opening its doors in December 1994, Room at the Inn has served more than 300 women and their children. More than just a place to live, Room at the Inn offers women a Christ-centered rehabilitation program, based on education, personal responsibility and spiritual direction punctuated with mental health and adoption counseling services.

Transportation and social appointments, work and school is provided, as is training in parenting, nutrition, budgeting, chastity and job skills. Mothers often work to pay off past creditors and to restore their credit ratings.

Many of the mothers who find Room at the Inn arrive broken in heart and spirit, often rejected by their families and the fathers of their babies.

As a response to research that shows that 37 percent of all pregnant college-age women have abortions, Room at the Inn also plans to launch a program to provide the organization's professional services to pregnant students on area college campuses.

"If we're each going to be faithful to Jesus Christ, we must stand on the platform of life," said Father Pavone.

Religious, lay observers speak of healing power of Eucharist

Pope Benedict XVI attends eucharistic adoration in St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican Oct. 17. With simplicity and long stretches of silence, the pope and members of the Synod of Bishops gathered together to show their devotion to the Eucharist.

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Eucharist has the power to heal shattered lives and even transform the world, but first it needs to permeate people's daily existence, said some participants at the Synod of Bishops.

Their testimony Oct. 12 was the first time synod fathers heard the voices of 25 lay and religious women and men, who offered their perspective and experience in promoting the power of the Eucharist.

These observers do not have voting power in the Oct. 2-23 synod, but they were invited to offer their views.

Sister Elvira Petrozzi, a founder of the Cenacle Community in Italy, told of the healing power she has seen resulting from eucharistic prayer. For 22 years she has worked with homeless adults, children and drug addicts.

She said she had no idea what "therapeutic or medicinal method" she could offer the substance abusers, since "no pill gives the joy of life and a heart at peace."

Instead, she said, she offered people her experience of God's mercy and the practice of personal prayer and eucharistic adoration.

At first, people would not understand why they were kneeling before a consecrated host, and she said she would explain that "the Eucharist is not understood with the head, but is experienced in the heart."

After a while, these troubled teens and adults would undergo a "eucharistic miracle," Sister Petrozzi said.

Slowly "you would see their eyes get brighter as they began to understand and as they began to experience God in the Eucharist, and that's when you knew that they were being healed," she said.

In the Eucharist, Jesus left his people "a treasure, the medicine, the most extraordinary light for leading us out of the darkness of evil," she said.

Canossian Sister Margaret Wong of Hong Kong told participants that church workers promoted eucharistic adoration for physically and mentally disabled people, they found there were many apparently normal, but still vulnerable people who needed God's loving embrace.

There were people in society "with a broken self-image, broken relationships and broken spirit (who) were rejected by their broken families and our broken society marked with secularism and materialism."

Sister Wong said they invited many of these people "to seek spiritual healing from our eucharistic Lord" and that many "inner healings were reported."

She said in the Eucharist, one can see "the broken heart of Christ thirsting to save a broken humanity; in him we learn to embrace and love sincerely all these broken ones."

Inside and out

Many synod observers noted that for the Eucharist to have a real effect on people's lives, it must be lived outside the Mass in one's daily routine.

Zbigniew Nosowski, a member of the national council of the laity in Poland, said a "eucharistic spirituality" involves not just going to Mass and adoration of the Eucharist. He said lay Christians "need a new understanding of relations between the Eucharist and their everyday life."

The Eucharist has something "very important and very concrete" to say for life and decision-making.

The Eucharist says "the more you give yourself to others, the more you'll find yourself; the more you love, the more you should sacrifice; the more you give, the more you'll receive," he said.

He said having this "eucharistic attitude" was key to becoming "a truly eucharistic person, even if you do not participate in the holy Mass every day."

Through her selfless and total giving to God's will, Mary, the mother of Jesus, was "a woman of the Eucharist (even) before it was established," said Nosowski.

He said it was crucial that the plight of the poor not be forgotten, especially when receiving the Eucharist. The two great treasures of the church, he said, are the Eucharist and the poor, but seldom are they linked.

"We need visible signs of their unity" so those who share in the eucharistic bread "should always in a visible way express their solidarity with the poor ones who do not have their daily bread to eat."

A world with hope

Christian Brother Alvaro Rodriguez Echeverria, president of the Union of Superior Generals in Costa Rica, said this sense of mission inherent in the Eucharist can help people change the world.

He said that in working in youth ministry, he saw young people develop "a new passion" to do something for their communities and the world.

By meeting Christ, many young people would find personal "tranquility and peace," and they would "also find the strength to discover the world of their crucified brothers and sisters," who were victims of war, violence and hunger and without a future, he said.

He said young people were the most sensitive among the church's members when it came to understanding "the dashed hopes that daily afflict millions of children and young people in today's world."

Sister Rita Burley, superior general of the Handmaids of the Sacred Heart of Jesus in Great Britain, said the "Eucharist and work for justice are inseparable."

"Communion with Christ in the Eucharist implies accepting the moral responsibility to work with him, in collaboration with others, to transform unjust structures and mentalities into strategies and plans which further the true nature of God's love for our human family," she said.

By gazing upon Christ in the Eucharist, she said, one sees "the loving kindness of God, and so we look on the world with hope."

Inspiration needed, archbishop says

Archbishop Gregory said the church across the world has to speak to a variety of audiences, including Catholics who regularly attend Mass, young Catholics who have not yet been "properly evangelized and catechized," people who "have yet to be evangelized," and Catholics who have become "disenfranchised for whatever reason" from the church.

All these people "belong to the heart and soul of the church," he said, and bishops, priests and religious have a responsibility to "develop strategies that address the different life situations" of all of them.

He said the way the Gospel message is communicated may adapt to fit the times and different audiences, but the truths inherent in church teaching may not.

Church leaders must concentrate on "allowing the teaching and the truth of the Gospel to be translated into a way of communication" with people who come from a myriad of backgrounds.

The church also needs vibrant, inspiring preachers, he said in his Oct. 11 speech to synod members.

"In the United States of America, some of our Catholic people will go to Sunday Mass and then return home to listen to the radio or view the televised religious programming of other Christian denominations simply because they are still hungry for inspiring preaching," he said, according to information released by the Vatican.

"Still others go so far as to attend religious services at these other churches after they've attended Sunday Mass," he said.

The archbishop told synod participants that he has "repeatedly heard of people who regularly will travel excessive distances to participate in a Mass that has a celebrant with proven capability to offer a serious, moving and compelling homily."

He offered a quote from the late German Cardinal Augustin Bea, who said a priest who was skilled in offering the sacrifice in the Mass, but not in breaking open the word of God for people, was only exercising half his priestly ministry.

How the priest says the words of the eucharistic prayer is important, he said, because Catholics "are starving for truly prayerful expressions of the eucharistic actions."

Indian Cardinal Telesphore Toppo of Ranchi, Bishop William S. Skylstad of Spokane, Wash. and Archbishop Anthony Sablan Apuron of Agaña, Guam, are seen at a meeting of the Synod of Bishops on the Eucharist at the Vatican Oct. 13. Bishop Skylstad is president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Prayers throughout the Mass and liturgy must be offered in a way that "inspire and edify the faithful," said Archbishop Gregory.

"We bishops, in our role as the primary preachers in our local churches, must lead in our own good example rather than merely asking our priests and deacons to be better prepared homilists for our people," he said in his speech.

Open discussions

Archbishop Gregory, who was participating for the second time in a Synod of Bishops, told CNS that Pope Benedict XVI's introduction of an hour of open discussion at the end of the day has been "a very helpful opportunity" for the synod participants "to say what is on (their) mind and heart in a less-structured way."

There had been "a certain predictability" in formal synod discussions, which tend to follow the working document released before the start of a synod, he said.

The open discussion was going "very, very well," he said, adding he thought the pope had really "set the stage for that type of exchange" of free, "open conversation."

He said Pope Benedict has been "a rapt listener" during the presentations, takes notes and "is engaged."

"When there are humorous things said, he chuckles, and yet he listens carefully to what is being said," said the archbishop.

"I think the stage is set for a good synod whatever the end product (or final document) may be," he said. This synod has been taking place in "a very warm and collegial atmosphere," which is "always a good thing," he added.

Vatican releases Pope Benedict's first book, 'God's Revolution'

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican joined with other publishers in an 18-nation release of Pope Benedict XVI's first book as pope — a collection of his speeches from August events in Cologne, Germany.

In his newest book, titled "God's Revolution," the pope "outlines the project for his pontificate," according to a press release by the Italian publishers, San Paolo.

The Italian edition hit bookstores in Italy Oct. 11, while the English edition published by Ignatius Press was expected to be ready for release in the United States and Canada by the end of October.

The 129-page volume "deals with the questions of Christian faith and the destiny of humanity, of the state of Israel, Islam, the legacy and the future of the church and society," said the press release.

But instead of any new pronouncements, the book is a collection of talks the pope gave during the Aug. 18-21 events in Cologne, including World Youth Day and meetings with representatives of Germany's Jewish and Muslim communities. The texts include the pope's complete remarks, not just his original written addresses.

The Vatican saw there was a need to release the full content of the pope's spoken presentations in book form so that they would be available to the wider public.

The papal vicar of Rome, Cardinal Camillo Ruini, said that while the media gave extensive coverage of the youth gathering this summer, the contents of the pope's speeches "inevitably received rather minor circulation."

"It's impossible for the mass media to cover everything," he said at a press conference Oct. 11. He added there is little room for media outlets "to delve into the content" of the pope's speeches.

Father Claudio Rossini, head of the Vatican's publishing house, Libreria Editrice, said turning the 12 speeches the pope made in Cologne into a book helps "distribute the texts beyond the usual channels" of the Vatican's newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, and the Vatican's television, CTV.

The pope's discourses are rich in teaching and instruction that "need to be read, reread and reread again patiently," Father Rossini told Catholic News Service.

Father Rossini said the Vatican wanted to see "how the market responds to this" before deciding if it would publish other key addresses in book form.

Cardinal Ruini, who wrote the book's introduction, said the collection of speeches represents a guidebook and "source of light" for Christian living.

The book's teachings show that the pope is "a great teacher of the faith and at the same time a shepherd who knows the path that will lead us into intimacy with God," he said.

Humility goes a long way

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I don't usually look to Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein for theological inspiration, but the first musical they wrote — "Oklahoma!" — features some lyrics sung by the matronly and wise Aunt Eller Murphy while trying to bring peace between farmer and rancher:

"I'd like to teach you all a little sayin', and learn the words by heart the way you should. I don't say I'm no better than anybody else, but I'll be dang'd if I ain't jist as good!"

I have often heard people propose variations on this saying as a good working definition of humility, a theme that runs throughout all the selected readings for this Sunday. The more I reflect on those readings, the more I think that Aunt Eller had it right — with a few qualifications.

Humility has been held as one of the great virtues indicating personal holiness; one need only look at the lives of the saints for myriad examples. However, today's readings seem to be even more concerned with the importance of humility in religious leaders — not merely the ordained ones, but anyone responsible for the care of souls and the proclamation of the word of God.

The prophet Malachi curses those priests who injure worshipers by their deceptive practices, partial decisions and false instruction.

Jesus likewise exposes the hypocrisy of those scribes and Pharisees who use their positions of leadership to bring honor to themselves while excessively burdening those in their care.

The psalmist and St. Paul, however, provide a model and a remedy for such self-exaltation.

"My heart is not proud, nor are my eyes haughty," says the psalmist, and St. Paul maintains that it is because of the demeanor of the apostles — who had every right to impose their status but chose to serve others humbly — that the word of God was able to be favorably received.

Secure in their identities as God's beloved and Christ's followers, they neither debased themselves nor sought their own glorification but freely performed the words of Jesus: "The greatest among you must be your servant."

It is difficult to remain humble with those we lead. Our freely chosen, self-effacing attitude of service — especially toward those over whom we hold religious authority — opens the way for God's word to be heard and received.

Questions:

Over whom do you have authority? When has your leadership of them been self-centered or prideful? How will you practice humble service toward those you lead?

A call worth taking

Orlando Bloom and Kirsten Dunst star in a "Elizabethtown," a sentimental, if not completely satisfying, romantic comedy drama about a disgraced sneaker designer (Bloom) who, after nearly sinking his employer's footwear empire and contemplating suicide, must retrieve the remains of his father — who died unexpectedly — in rural Kentucky. There he reconnects with his roots and, while en route, encounters a sunny, free-spirited flight attendant (Dunst) who brightens his view and appreciation of the world.

Despite a miscast Bloom and a baggy script, director Cameron Crowe's film celebrates family and love, imparting a warm and welcome message that, though full of risk, life is ultimately worth living.

An implied sexual encounter, an attempted suicide, a questionable (for Catholics) dispersal of ashes, and some rough and crude language. Cardinals of a different kind

Three baseball players reflect on their Catholic faith

BY JEAN M. SCHILDZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ST. LOUIS (CNS) — St. Louis Cardinals players David Eckstein, John Rodriguez and Jeff Suppan recently stepped up to the plate to talk about their Catholic faith.

In interviews with the St. Louis Review, archdiocesan newspaper, the Redbirds' shortstop, outfielder and pitcher, respectively, said their faith is very important to them. While they do not often tout their religion in public, they believe their actions on and off the field define them as Catholics.

All three professional athletes were born into the faith. Each goes to Mass regularly and has made prayer a key part of his daily life.

On Oct. 8 the Cardinals beat the San Diego Padres 7-4, to win a best-of-five series in the first round of the National League playoffs. They faced the Houston Astros for the National League Championship Series.

Eckstein treats his faith like he plays shortstop — very seriously.

Being on the road so much and playing weekend games can play havoc with going to Mass, but Eckstein makes it a priority.

"I make sure I attend Mass every week," he said, recalling that the only time he has missed Mass during his five years in the majors was in Toronto. The team was there during the SARS (severe acute respiratory syndrome) scare, and players could not leave the hotel except to play ball.

He also prays every day, including before every game. He asks for the grace "to be the best I can be, and be the best team player I can be to help the team be successful on that day."

When in St. Louis for a weekend series, Eckstein likes going to Mass at Busch Stadium. Mass is offered there on weekends for club personnel and stadium employees.

Black Catholics inspired at meeting

"It was an excellent opportunity for me to meet and network with other black Catholic administrators from across the country," said Murdock.

"I learned so much about the programs other black Catholic ministries are conducting, their activities in their communities and their commitments to the mission of the office of black Catholic ministry — understanding and faith equals leadership and direction," she said.

NABCA provides a forum for black Catholics to gather and share their collective resources to address the spiritual needs, leadership issues and concerns facing the black communities it serves. The membership is comprised of laity, religious and clergy representing more than 60 dioceses throughout the United States.

The retreat opened with a spiritual session led by Sister Patricia Haley, a Sister of Charity and a founding member of the National Black Sisters' Conference. Sister Haley focused on "The Collaborative Leader: Listening to the Wisdom of God's People."

The meeting addressed issues related to recent NABCA congresses, the realities of ministering to black Catholics and the Catholic Church's response to hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Participants shared how their individual dioceses responded to the needs of the hurricane survivors on the Gulf Coast, where a large percentage of black Catholics reside. Participants were encouraged to continue seeking and welcoming black Catholic hurricane survivors into their parishes and to evangelize all survivors.

NABCA's actions focus on the Catholic Church of the United States. Every meeting provides the opportunity to proclaim the Word, heal and serve, worship and build and strengthen community.

Murdock will utilize much of what was covered at the meeting for the African American Affairs Ministry.

"I came away with some wonderful ideas to enhance our forthcoming programs that will energize our communities," she said.

"The African American Affairs Ministry will continue to lend support to and be advocates for black people of African descent," said Murdock. "One of the goals of our strategic plan is to offer programs that educate all people with regard to our rich history in the Catholic Church, our heritage, culture and the wonderful gifts we bring to the community."

Sleepless nights for earthquake relief workers workers and officials were camped. They were spearheading the Indian church's relief work for the victims of the Oct. 8 earthquake that has claimed more than 1,300 lives on the Indian side of Kashmir. Officials estimated nearly 53,000 were killed in Pakistan.

When the church volunteers failed to return to the base camp at Baramula, about 35 miles from the remote mountain villages in the worst-hit Uri region, Father Kalappurayil phoned top army officials, who said the workers' school bus had not crossed the army checkpoints.

The tension grew and by midnight officials from the Catholic Bishops' Conference of India, Caritas India and the Jammu-Kashmir Diocese decided to venture out to search for the missing volunteers.

After procuring special permission from top army officials to drive during the night curfew, Father Kalappurayil drove the church officials to the mountainous region beyond Uri.

When they returned, dejected, after five hours, Sister Elaine Nazareth, superior of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary-run St. Joseph Hospital, was dumbfounded. Sister Nazareth had spent the night eagerly awaiting the return of those missing: Father Susai Nathan, who led the church team; four nuns; several male volunteers; and a half-dozen Muslim nursing students from the Catholic hospital.

By the evening of Oct. 12, the volunteers had returned.

"We had no option but to stay back in the mountain. With pouring rains, we could not come down," said Father Nathan, who led the church volunteers to the remote villages at elevations of more than 8,000 feet.

After the volunteers split into three groups, Father Nathan said, his group hiked three hours along rocky pathways to reach Gwalan village, where no relief worker had been.

"It was a wonderful experience to stay with the villagers and spend the night in a partially damaged village house. We could feel the hard and difficult times they were undergoing," Father Nathan said.

Abhay Krunsha Kar, program officer of the U.S. bishops' overseas aid agency, Catholic Relief Services, and head of the group that went to Sangri village, said his team was "really touched by the hospitality of these people."

"Even in their suffering, they were concerned about our safety and did not allow us to walk down the mountains in heavy rains," he said.

Sister Liza Ignatius, a Franciscan Sister of Our Lady of Grace, attends to 3-month-old Amina in the mountain village of Sultan Daki, India, Oct. 13. Amina's mother died in the earthquake, but the child was found in the rubble four hours after the disaster. The nun, a medical doctor, is among half a dozen medical staff rushed to Kashmir from the Holy Family Hospital in New Delhi to serve earthquake victims in remote areas.

"I will never forget the night we spent with 30 villagers sitting crammed together in a damaged room (of the lone standing house in the village), chatting through the night," said Kar.

The third team, led by Sister Shiny, a member of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary who did not give her full name, had returned from Jabala village to the spot where the school bus had been parked.

"We waited and waited for (the other teams) and hoped they would come soon. So, we stayed in the bus the whole night in the cold," she said.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Churches: Don't ask to be reimbursed by the government for charity

In the wake of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, many people have done extraordinary acts of generosity. Throughout the country churches have extended themselves to thousands of evacuees by providing housing, food, financial assistance and spiritual care.

For Christian churches this is not just a good deed. It is an essential part of our Gospel mission. Without this charity, we are not truly the followers of Jesus Christ and are not fulfilling his command to love our neighbor.

That is why I was distressed to read in the Washington Post Sept. 27 that FEMA was contemplating reimbursing churches and other faith-based groups for their charity to hurricane victims. This is a very bad idea, not only for the churches but for the government.

In the rush to redeem itself after its incompetent response to Hurricane Katrina, the federal government seems determined to throw money in every direction. But churches should not take this money for three reasons.

—First, it was charity, not a reimbursable government expense. Were we giving freely from our hearts and out of our substance, or were we giving with an eye toward getting reimbursed?

If churches take federal dollars, these acts of kindness become a government program, not a sacrifice made in the Lord's name and for the love of our brothers and sisters. When we do an act of charity, we should not look around for someone either to praise or reimburse us.

—Second, what happens next time? As sure as the sun rises in the morning there will be another natural disaster or humanitarian crisis. What then? Won't people be skeptical about giving and cynical about our motives? If churches, Catholic or otherwise, go to their people for support, the people might say: "Why should I give? You are just going to turn around and ask the federal government for reimbursement."

Government reimbursement will be a short-term gain, but a long-term loss.

—Third, it is an inappropriate entanglement of government and religion. I really do believe in the separation of church and state, not so much because it is good for the state but because it is very good for religion.

In general I agree that "he who pays the piper calls the tune." If the federal government pays the piper, it is only a matter of time before it will start calling the tune. Then in short order the Salvation Army will no longer be able to mention salvation. Catholic Charities will no longer be Catholic.

If we accept federal money for charity to hurricane victims, what will be the restrictions? Are we allowed to put Bibles and rosaries on cots in the shelters? Are we allowed to offer a prayer before serving meals? Are we allowed to offer religious services and prayers in shelters paid for by federal money? Can there be a chapel?

Some churches argue that they have 20 years of wear and tear on their facilities after housing evacuees. Good. They should wear it proudly: Jesus would be happy to see that kind of wear and tear.

The whole church, everywhere, should be willing to join together to help individual congregations bear relief expenses. My own parish has sent nearly $20,000 to various churches along the Gulf Coast to help with hurricane expenses. That's how it should be done: church to church, not government to church.

We should not kid ourselves. We are not rendering a sacrifice to God if we ask Caesar to pay our bills. Once we invite Caesar into our temples to pay for our "charity," we may never get him out.

Pope says people should love God, who is always forgiving

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — People should not fear God, thinking he is always ready to punish, but rather they should love him because he is always ready to forgive, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"God is not a relentless sovereign who condemns the guilty, but a loving father whom we must love not out of fear of punishment, but because of his goodness," the pope said Oct. 19 during his weekly general audience.

The pope's audience talk focused on Psalm 130, often called the "De Profundis" from the Latin version of the initial words of its first line: "Out of the depths I cry to you, O Lord; Lord, hear my voice!"

Pope Benedict told an estimated 40,000 people gathered under a light drizzle in St. Peter's Square that the psalm is "a hymn to divine mercy and reconciliation between the sinner and the Lord, a God who is just but always ready to reveal himself as merciful and compassionate."

The psalm, he said, begins with a voice crying out from the depths of evil and guilt, a voice of awe-filled reverence in recognition of God's great power, but also filled with trust in God's ability to forgive and save.

The Pope Speaks

POPE

After the psalmist acknowledges his sin, he demonstrates his hope, "the certainty that God will pronounce a liberating word and cancel his sin," the pope said.

Pope Benedict said that for Catholics the psalm is "an invitation to confession and the gift of reconciliation."

He also quoted St. Ambrose who said, "Never lose hope in divine forgiveness, however great your sin. With God there can always be a change of heart if you acknowledge your offense."

At the end of the audience, the pope blessed a new statue placed in a niche on the exterior of St. Peter's Basilica. The statue is of St. Mariana de Jesus Paredes Flores, Ecuador's first saint.

The jigsaw puzzle of life

Games can reveal the mysteries of life, faith

I was struggling with a jigsaw puzzle yesterday, trying to make pieces that sure looked like they should fit together actually merge.

All of a sudden I realized in a blinding epiphany of spiritual insight (I might have heard drum rolls augmented by thunder in the distance) that jigsaw puzzles are a most excellent metaphor for life and faith.

OK, not necessarily the jigsaws with only nine huge pieces or the sappy ones of cats sleeping on a country porch next to a rocking chair, but the great religious stuff would be the ones of Alpine mountains or Gothic cathedrals.

Just think of it. We are given all these pieces of life that seem like they should fit together, but when you throw them out onto the table of time you can't tell what the heck they are supposed to be, much less how they fit together. So you start looking for the pieces that have straight edges in the hope they will at least create a border within which the other pieces can be corralled.

But you desperately need the picture on the box to give you guidance. That's our Catholic faith, see? We need the vision, the goal, the guiding principle.

Think of the pieces with the straight edges as natural law. But we need more. We need that illustration on the box. Without it, the puzzle (a.k.a. as "life") is exponentially more difficult. We are left fiddling with puzzle pieces that tease and taunt but do not really belong together or even fit or even merge without whacking them with the soup spoon of life.

Pretty cool, eh? One can think of the illustration on the box as the catechism, or the teachings of the church, or the tradition of the church, or the Ten Commandments backed up by the Beatitudes, or your fourth grader teacher Sister Mary Bernadette.

So if you think of those little blue pieces as the myriad of little decisions we have to make in a day and how difficult that would be without the guidance of a moral sense, then don't you think a jigsaw puzzle is just like life and that the picture on the box is like the moral compass of faith?

That first job and the reality of work

Take pride in your work, no matter how trivial

I started looking for an after-school job only days after I turned 16. I found one quickly, and a week later I was dressed in a colorful vest at my very own checkout counter in a local discount department store, helping the good residents of my town go home with new clothes and bottles of Clorox.

I took my first paycheck to the bank and cashed my haul. Comparatively, it wasn't much, but for a girl whose previous employment was periodic baby-sitting, the paycheck was a golden promise of mall spree and movie matinees.

It didn't quite work out that way.

Because I was working four days a week, my friends went to the mall without me. And because my boss scheduled me for shifts that ran from 2 p.m. to 10 p.m., I missed most movies and didn't have time to go shopping for clothes and CDs as I'd hoped to do. The challenge of the job, which seemed so interesting when I was learning about processing coupons, running credit cards and approving tax-free purchases, dropped off after a week or two.

None of the cashiers really talked that much or were even friendly to one another; we came, worked and left. The front-end supervisor barked at us and had little patience for screw-ups. It was quite different from the gentle, more accommodating treatment we got at school — yes, even in detention where you served your time and the offense was forgotten. Here, the wrong mistake could get you fired.

The reality of work certainly didn't line up with what I'd expected.

They don't teach you about the minutiae of daily job life at school. Even with the most fun, most interesting and most "fulfilling" jobs out there, people still have to deal with mounds of drudge work and difficult days. Even the most important CEOs have to spend hours sitting in meetings. Recording artists pull grueling 16-hour days in the studio. Doctors and nurses save lives, yes, but that's between the mounds of paperwork they have to complete.

I've held a number of jobs including working in a bookstore, flipping burgers and teaching grammar at my college's writing center. They all shared one particular quality: Despite the stellar moments each job promised, the day-to-day slog could be overwhelmingly dull if I allowed it to be.

As I scanned item after item and dealt with difficult customers, I realized that the job wasn't going to change; I would have to.

If the job didn't challenge me, I thought, I'd have to create the challenges myself. So I made a game out of how many customers I could process in one hour, competed with myself to sell more of this or of that, and increased my transaction accuracy level so I didn't have to deal with the front-end supervisor. On my one-year anniversary, the boss was pleased with my performance, and I got a raise.

I also coordinated my schedule with the store's human resources manager so that I didn't have to work evenings during the week. Instead, I could see my friends, do my homework and spend some quality time at the Cineplex. I also ramped up my efforts to be friendly to my socially reticent co-workers, and it paid off: I'm still friends with one of them nearly 10 years later.

Whether you're scooping ice cream, pumping gas or reigning as king of the checkout line, it's something to remember: Work may be dull at times, but it doesn't have to be boring.

How disasters affect us

The Human Side

FATHER
EUGENE HEMRICK

Many people I know are wondering aloud about a world that seems to be torn asunder by disasters.

More than 300,000 people have been killed or orphaned by the Dec. 26 tsunami, hurricanes Katrina and Rita, the mudslides in Central America and the recent earthquake in Pakistan, India and Afghanistan.

Add to this the terrorist alerts, the possibility of a bird-flu plague as devastating as the Black Death and daily reports of people being blown up by suicide bombers, and is it any wonder that so many people are fearful?

I have to wonder if these catastrophic events are one reason we are seeing a surge in the suicide rate of college students. Young people are very sensitive, coming at life with enthusiasm and freshness. The disadvantage in this is that they haven't experienced enough of life to be able to sort it out and get control over its darker side.

Some evangelists are using these ominous occasions to say we aren't living life according to the Ten Commandments. Others won't go this far, but they hold that God's hand is behind the disasters and is prompting us to pray more.

I believe there is another dimension to disasters that will help us better understand where God is in a world that seems to be coming apart.

One psalm reads: "I am like a dead man, forgotten, like a thing to be thrown away. I have heard the slander of the crowd. Fear is all around me. ... But as for me, I trust in you, Lord. I say: 'You are my God.'"

When dark events crash upon us, we feel as if we are like the psalm's "dead man, forgotten." When this happens, it is as if all our strength has left us. A feeling of having lost control over our own life sets in. Worse than this, fear creates a sense of loneliness, as if we are the only ones in its grip.

On the other side of this spectrum of fear is faith, a spirit that engenders strength and says to us: "You aren't alone. God is with you. When you embrace him nothing can break your spirit. Faith is your strength, your companion, your means of taking control!"

Christ was forever reminding us to battle fear with faith. History reminds us that disasters have always been part of life in this world and that the world has not quite fallen apart. With faith, humankind met the challenges and overcame them.

The times we live in are challenging us to follow the wisdom of Christ and of history. Now is the time to raise our faith to a new level. With the power of faith, nothing should break our spirit.

What a will can do for you

There are at least six things a well crafted will can do for you.

1. A will can let you close the books on your earthly stewardship responsibilities. You've made careful decisions to conserve your estate during life and you naturally want to do the same at death.

Through your will, you can wrap up your affairs and "put your house in order."

2. A will can help you express your love and thoughtfulness to others.

When a person dies without a will, those who are left behind must sort out the estate and make difficult decisions without the necessary preparation. Uncertainties arise. Disagreements develop. The grieving process is compounded by frustration.

What a difference there is when the bereaved are left with funeral instructions, an inventory list and a well crafted will.

3. A will can remind your loved ones of your basic beliefs and commitments, and can affirm your guiding principles. Your words can provide comfort and encouragement.

The way you distribute your estate can also express your commitments. Bequests to family members show your love and concern for their welfare. And bequests to organizations speak volumes about your values.

4. A will can ensure that your desires are fulfilled.

If you have dependent children, you can designate who will care for them. You can specify the person who will handle the closing of your estate. You can select the trustee to oversee one or more trusts.

You can time the distribution of gifts to children and grandchildren. You can designate the giving of specific items to family members and friends. You can make provisions to support charitable organizations.

A will puts you in the driver's seat and allows you to make decisions according to your values, concerns and commitments.

5. A will can conserve your assets, ensuring that more funds are available to meet your objectives.

A will may also reduce the administrative costs of probate and reduce estate taxes. Wise stewardship means making sure your assets go as far as possible.

6. A will can provide peace of mind. You can relax in the knowledge that your temporal affairs are in order. You have cared for those persons and those concerns close to your heart. Your will can also bring a sense of peace and security to others.

With all these benefits, one might expect that every person would have a will. But the opposite is true. About half of all Americans die without a will. And many of those wills are out of date or invalid.

For most people, making a will is like preparing a tax return — they put it off as long as they can. You may recognize some of these excuses: "It's too expensive"; "I can't handle the decisions"; "My estate is too small"; "It will hasten my death"; "I don't have time"; "I don't know who to name as my executor or as a trustee or as the guardian for my children"; "I don't know where all my records are"; "I'll do it later."

Have you been putting off preparing a will? Do you have an outdated will? Now is a good time to take care of this.

Give your attorney a call today and make an appointment. Sound professional advice will contribute to your peace of mind and that of your family.

PARISH PROFILE

Brevard parish is heart of Catholic community in Transylvania County

Sacred Heart Church in Brevard has been the spiritual home for many Catholics in Transylvania County for nearly 60 years.

BREVARD — The story of Sacred Heart Church is rooted in the history of the Catholics who pioneered the mountainous region of western North Carolina. The earliest known Catholic presence in Transylvania County can be traced to 1820. At that time, about the nearest Catholic community was far away in Charleston, S.C.

The first permanent settlement occurred in what is now the Sapphire-Whitewater area when Dr. Christopher Grimshawe moved there in the 1890s from the Piedmont area of South Carolina. West Virginian Louis Carr arrived in 1913 to establish a sawmill and a lumber company in the heavily forested region.

Shortly thereafter, Rosemarie Morris, raised Catholic by her convert mother, Mary Helen Young, moved with her family from the Nantahala area to Brevard. Today, the Morris family has deep ancestral ties to the Young, Queen and Nimrod Jarrett families who still inhabit the region.

The establishment of paper mills in Depression-plagued 1938 was a financial boon to the area. The mills attracted job seekers, Catholics among them, who came from around the country. For these early arrivals, the weekly trip to Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville was the road to maintaining their faith.

Within a year, however, the growing number of Catholics in the Brevard area warranted the establishment of a mission staffed by the Hendersonville priests. For the next 10 years, Mass was celebrated in civic halls, bank buildings and private residences.

The organization of Catholics in Transylvania County in 1946, later named the Brevard Catholic Society, witnessed the vision that was to become Sacred Heart Church. Representatives from the Catholic community petitioned then-Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh for a parish of their own. Through fund-raisers such as spaghetti dinners, dance and card parties, along with the generosity of benefactors, the local faithful scraped together enough money to purchase land and start design and construction.

Bishop Waters dedicated the original Sacred Heart Church on Aug. 28, 1949. The 30 founding families who undertook the challenge to form as a parish and build the first church are commemorated on a bronze plaque located in the entry to the current church building.

Growth of the parish family continued, and by the early 1960s, it was necessary to expand. A new wing was added in 1965 but even this larger structure was soon too small. The nucleus of a small but growing Catholic presence was felt in Cashiers and Sapphire Valley, and in 1972, under the pastoral leadership of Father Edward Sheridan, St. Jude Chapel was built and dedicated.

Planning for the current church building on Brian Berg Lane was initiated in 1984. Architect and parishioner Al Platt designed the new complex, created to meet the spiritual, social and formation needs of the growing parish. On Nov. 27, 1988, then-Bishop John F. Donoghue dedicated the new church.

The parish steadily continued to grow and the demands of faith formation, administration and fellowship during the pastorate of Father Carl T. Del Giudice lead to the planning, design, construction and the eventual dedication of the Parish Life Center in 1998.

On Aug. 21, 1999, Sacred Heart parishioners celebrated the church's 50th anniversary with more than 450 parishioners, young and old, attending a Mass with then-Bishop William G. Curlin.

"We're celebrating the events of our lives," Father Del Giudice, said at the celebration. He also took the opportunity to pay tribute to "the very hard work, courage and fortitude that built the community we have here."

A considerable number of the parishioners devote themselves to various ecumenical and interfaith organizations such as Habitat for Humanity, S.A.F.E., Rise and Shine, and Transylvania Christian Ministries Association, a local charity outreach. At this organization, known locally as Sharing House, parishioners oversee the distribution of donated food and clothing to needy families.

At the S.A.F.E. house, volunteers care for battered women. At Rise and Shine, they serve as volunteer counselors and help school children after school with their lessons.

Sacred Heart Church enjoys a steady annual growth rate, of which a considerable number are not only retirees, but also young immigrants from Mexico and other Latin American countries. All are becoming active and committed members of the parish family.

In order to meet the faith demands of this growing parish family, four Masses are offered each weekend including one celebrated in Spanish. Parallel faith formation tracks are offered for both English-speaking and Spanish-speaking children, youth and adults.

VATICAN CITY — The Synod of Bishops closed with a strong call for eucharistic renewal, urging a deeper understanding of the Eucharist among the world's Catholics but no major changes in church rules on priestly celibacy or shared Communion.

Pope Benedict XVI, who presided over the three-week assembly, formally closed the synod Oct. 23 with a Mass in St.

Catholics should also understand that "no dichotomy is admissible between faith and life," he said.

Balance4Success project seeks to keep Sundays for family

ST. PAUL, Minn. (CNS) — Seeking to restore balance to family life, a parents' group in Minnesota hopes to recapture Sunday as a day for families, not organized sports.

"Coaches are interested in scheduling as much play time as they possibly can," said Andrea Grazzini Walstrom, founder of Balance4Success. "Sunday is just another day they can use to get kids out playing."

The Balance4Success initiative "Taking Back Sunday" seeks a boycott of sports practices, games and tournaments scheduled on Sundays.

"We're just trying to force the athletic system to think a little differently," said Terrie Pearson, a parishioner at Mary, Mother of the Church in Burnsville. "It has gotten out of hand. They're just kids."

Sunday sports steal valuable time from the family, said Grazzini Walstrom. Although sports can bring "great benefits" for children, such as social skills and lessons in responsibility and leadership, "those aren't the only skills we want them to have. We want them to understand family connectivity," she said.

In the midst of their children's jam-packed schedules, families struggle to find time together. University of Minnesota professor Bill Doherty calls this phenomenon "overscheduled kids and underconnected families."

Parents involved in Balance4Success suspect that other parents want more family time but lack the courage or support to oppose the scheduling.

"It's hard to speak up — it seems like you're being selfish and denying your child an opportunity," Doherty said. "Parents have a hard time doing that if they think they're the only ones. We're trying to empower people to know that there are a lot of folks who are concerned."

While hoping to reach out to like-minded parents, Balance4Success is not directly trying to change any parent's mind.

Grazzini Walstrom is realistic about the boycott's consequences. While she hopes teams will stop holding games and practices on Sundays, she knows some will ask the boycotting players to leave.

A parishioner at St. Thomas Becket Church in Eagan, Paul Caron said hockey is part of the family time he spends with his three boys. "I don't see a problem with balancing both," he said.

Families are not the only ones struggling to find time on Sundays amid sports schedules. Many churches are having difficulty scheduling youth events, Grazzini Walstrom said.

Churches "have to build faith formation around sports, and they think that's backward," she said. "They think that faith and family should come before sports. But, unfortunately, in our culture that is not what is happening."

Bonnie Serio, faith formation coordinator at St. John Neumann in Eagan, said sports leagues conflict with youth activity scheduling all week long. "The travel leagues are killing us," she said.

Programs funded by California institute offer hope after tsunami

DALY CITY, Calif. — In Colachel, India, $7,000 builds a home to replace one destroyed by December's tsunami.

Thanks to the Catholic-run Seton Institute in California, 20 new houses have been completed for families. The institute, which funds health care projects in impoverished countries, is also providing skill-building classes.

But even more importantly, hope is rising in the tsunami-affected region, said Sister Flory Paraniham, who thanked the institute for raising $1 million in tsunami relief funds.

"The world came together," said Sister Flory, a Sister of St. Anne whose order conducts educational programs in sewing and computer skills for widows, young girls and expectant mothers who lost everything to the sea.

Although "recovery will take years," she said, "a beginning has been made."

Women in programs funded by the Seton Institute receive a year of free skills training. In the craft and sewing programs, items are sold and the money is kept in trust for when the women leave the program. Then, each woman is given a sewing machine, "and after that they will be able to stand on their own," Sister Flory said.

"Everything was not lost in the tsunami, although in those days, it felt as if it were. Individuals at that time asked me, 'Where is my future? What will happen to me?' and I had no answers," Sister Flory said.

"Now I can say, 'There is an answer,' she added. "Thanks to Seton Institute, lives are being rebuilt."

The institute, based in Daly City, recently announced funding totaling $60,000 to five health projects in Poland, Uganda, Rwanda, Liberia and Haiti.

"We are always looking for new, worthy health care projects in disadvantaged countries where Catholic sisters are leveraging a small amount of money into a very large return," said Sister Joyce Weller, a Daughter of Charity who chairs the board of Seton Institute.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope Benedict's first encyclical finished, to be released in December

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI has finished writing his first encyclical and is expected to release it in early December, Vatican sources said. The sources told Catholic News Service Oct. 20 that the encyclical was a 46-page spiritual meditation focusing in large part on "eros" (love) and "logos" (the word) and their relationship to the person of Christ. The pope worked on the encyclical during his summer stay at the papal residence outside Rome. The text was being translated into various languages, including English, the sources said. In two articles written before his election and published in a recent issue of the magazine Communio, Pope Benedict wrote about the unity of the word and love, as personified in Christ. He highlighted the importance of the personal encounter with Christ, which stirs up love, and said love of God helps define recitation of the rosary, followed by reconciliation and Mass. For more information, call Phil or Terri at (704) 888-6050.

Jesuit working for literacy in India wins $1 million Opus Prize

MILWAUKEE (CNS) — A Jesuit priest working in India to bring books and teachers to the desperately poor is the 2005 recipient of the $1 million Opus Prize. Jesuit Father Trevor Miranda heads Reach Education Action Program, founded in Mumbai, India, which has opened more than 450 literacy centers in just six years. The organization's goal, the priest said, is to bring literacy to "every street, pavement, slum, hilltop (and) tribal village, to bring about social transformation." The Opus Prize is given annually to individuals or organizations of any religious background that demonstrate innovative strategies to solve deeply rooted community problems in a Water-damaged Xavier University in New Orleans plans to reopen

WASHINGTON (CNS) — When Norman Francis was a freshman at Xavier University in New Orleans in 1948, his work-study scholarship landed him the job of repairing damaged books in the university library. These days, Francis, who has been Xavier's president for nearly four decades, is once again fixing things, although this time on a colossal scale: overseeing the repair of the entire university. The library books, damaged when the library filled with 6 feet of water in Hurricane Katrina, are just one of his concerns because nearly every campus building was waterlogged during the Aug. 29 storm and the massive flooding that followed. An early estimate of the recovery price tag, including reconstruction, faculty salaries and student financial aid, was about $90 million. Finding the money to pay for the loss is now the daunting task before school officials. Xavier, the country's only historically black Catholic university, does not have the large endowment that larger universities do. Instead, it has a $50 million endowment primarily restricted for scholarships. Eighty-five percent of its student body receives financial aid. The school's insurance will cover wind damage but not the extensive water damage on the campus.

Rebirth of Christian faith in former Communist republic

Children throw flowers in front of a procession marking the 70th anniversary of a priest's ordination in Miastkowka, Ukraine. Father Paul Wicker, pastor of Holy Apostles Church in Colorado Springs, Colo., brought an important message back to Catholics from his trip to Ukraine: Celebrate your faith and embrace the Eucharist. He spent six weeks in the former Soviet republic, which is enjoying a political and, for Catholics, religious rebirth.

SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL

Dec. 8 will mark the 40th anniversary of the close of the Second Vatican Council.

In the coming weeks, The Catholic News & Herald will feature a variety of stories looking back on the council and the impact it has had on the Catholic Church throughout the past four decades.

On page 10 of this week's issue, Father John Catoir highlights what were, in his opinion, the major accomplishments of the council.

Synod closes with eucharistic emphasis allowed to travel to Rome for the assembly and said the church in China was still on a "suffering path."

On Oct. 22 the synod handed the pope a list of 50 propositions, or final recommendations, which acknowledged a priest shortage in some parts of the world but said eliminating priestly celibacy and ordaining married men were not the solution.

"I think it is significant that there has been a massive restatement of the tradition in the Latin Church of mandatory celibacy for priests," Australian Cardinal George Pell of Sydney told reporters.

In an unusual move, the pope immediately ordered the propositions published; normally they are considered confidential. He said he would use the bishops' recommendations in preparing his own document sometime in the future.

The synod also published a final message, which asked Catholics to allow the Eucharist to transform their lives and the life of the world.

The message expressed pastoral concern and sadness for the situation of Catholics who have divorced and remarried civilly without an annulment, but offered no relaxation in church rules that prohibit them from receiving Communion.

The synod's propositions echoed that statement, but suggested that some margin of flexibility might be found in further study of church law on the conditions for annulments.

The status of divorced and remarried Catholics was one of several sensitive pastoral issues raised by bishops on the synod floor, leading some to expect the synod to call for revision of church policies. But in the end the assembly recommended no significant changes.

Instead, the synod:

- Praised the value of priestly celibacy and called for a greater push in vocations as the answer to the priest shortage. It said ordaining married men in the Latin church was "a road not to follow."

- Reaffirmed that shared Communion with non-Catholic Christians "is generally not possible" and said an "ecumenical concelebration" of the Eucharist would be even more objectionable.

At a closing press conference, French Archbishop Roland Minnerath of Dijon, the synod's special secretary, said it was a mistake to have expected major changes on issues like divorced Catholics.

"Obviously, the aim of the synod is not to introduce doctrinal or disciplinary innovations in the life of the church, but to renew pastoral support for these situations," he said.

"We cannot change the rules," he said.

Overall, the synod offered a strong endorsement of the liturgical reforms of the Second Vatican Council, saying they had greatly benefited the church. Abuses have occurred in the past, but have substantially diminished today, it said.

Despite recent speculation over wider latitude for celebrating the pre-Vatican II Tridentine Mass, the synod's final documents did not even mention that possibility.

The synod encouraged promotion of eucharistic adoration, but stressed that the practice should be seen in relation to Mass.

To promote better Mass attendance, the bishops recommended better liturgies, strong preaching and improved education of Catholics in their understanding of the Eucharist.

They also emphasized that while the Eucharist is the center of Christian life not everyone has an automatic right to receive it at all times.

The question of Communion and Catholic politicians received some attention at the synod. One final proposition called for "eucharistic coherence" and said Catholic lawmakers cannot promote laws that go against human good, justice and natural law.

But it indicated pastoral flexibility in determining whether specific politicians should receive Communion, saying bishops should "exercise the virtues of fortitude and prudence" and take into account local circumstances.

Archbishop Minnerath said the synod was not trying to single out politicians as a special group. Every Catholic is called to live the faith coherently and to consider that when it comes time for Communion, he said.

The synod's other recommendations included:

- Better emphasis on the missionary aspect of the Eucharist.

- Study and possible change in the order of the sacraments of baptism, confirmation and the Eucharist.

- Possible relocation in the liturgy of the sign of peace exchange.

- Reminding the faithful of the importance of genuflection or other gestures of adoration before the consecrated host.

- Better awareness of the Eucharist's connection with social justice issues, including ecological concerns.

With the end of the synod came the close of the Year of the Eucharist convened by Pope John Paul II. The bishops said they hoped the special year might be "a point of departure for a new evangelization of our globalized humanity that begins with the Eucharist."

Girl Scout organizes construction of new playground, earns Gold Award

CONCORD — Shannon Parette, a member of St. James Church in Concord, recently earned her Girl Scout Gold Award, the highest award a Girl Scout can earn.

To earn her recognition, presented by the Hornet's Nest Girl Scout Council, Shannon collaborated with three employees of New Beginnings Preschool, the parish preschool for St. James Church: Clovia Pattee, director; Dick Bensler, building chairperson; and Richard Borsuk, maintenance supervisor, to design and build a playground, "Noah's Landing," for the preschool.

Shannon organized several "work days" for parents of the preschoolers and parishioners of St. James Church to stake out the area, pour concrete for a bike path and chalk pad, install of new swings and spread mulch groundcover.

Shannon is a member of Troop 205, which is sponsored by Poplar Tent Presbyterian Church. She has been active in scouting for 12 years. A senior at Northwest High School in Concord, Shannon plans to pursue a career in the medical field upon graduation.

Miers never a Catholic, new report says have repeated the description that Miers was brought up Catholic but now attends an evangelical Protestant church.

However, according to White House spokeswoman Maria Tamburri, "Harriet Miers did not grow up Catholic."

When news reports first quoted the nominee's acquaintances as saying she had been raised a Catholic before joining an evangelical Protestant church in 1979, the editor of the Texas Catholic, newspaper of the Dallas Diocese, began checking records of baptisms and other sacraments.

"The Diocese of Dallas has no record of Harriet Miers or her immediate family ever having been a member of the Catholic Church," said Deacon Bronson Havard, spokesman for the Diocese of Dallas and editor of the newspaper. "We have checked all known sacramental records."

Miers' longtime friend, Texas Supreme Court Justice Nathan Hecht, has been variously quoted as saying Miers was "raised Catholic," or that her family attended both Catholic and Protestant churches or that she "had a Catholic upbringing."

Since her nomination was announced Oct. 3, those comments have evolved into the widespread assumption that Miers was a baptized Catholic who left the church as a young adult to join Valley View Christian Church with a full-immersion baptism. Several local and syndicated newspaper columnists have raised theological concerns about the favorable spin some evangelicals have given to the idea that Miers' left the Catholic Church to "find Christ" as an evangelical Protestant.

Miers might well have occasionally attended Catholic churches as a child or young adult, but there is no evidence that she ever considered herself a Catholic.

Deacon Havard also said as an active Catholic and journalist for 35 years in Dallas he has never heard anyone refer to Miers as a Catholic or former Catholic until the current set of rumors.

He noted that a local Episcopal church has pews dedicated to her parents and that she worshipped there with her family on a recent trip to Dallas. Deacon Havard also said it was reported locally that Miers on the same Sunday attended a worship service by a group that split from Valley View Christian Church, which she and Hecht, among others, recently left.

Unique book looks at history of prayer in United States

BY PATRICK J. HAYES
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"One Nation Under God" is an elegantly written survey of prayer in America that captures the spiritual imagination from the very first page.

James P. Moore Jr., a professor at Georgetown University's McDonough School of Business, begins with the death of his father and his resulting quest for solace in the nation's prayer practices. These practices are as diverse as they are plentiful. There are prayers — in connection with the land, music, preaching, literature, sports, politics — for nearly every occasion and taste. Subtitled "The History of Prayer in America," this soul-stirring book is one of the few recent histories of its kind and it promises to hold pride of place in writing on American culture.

Moore shows how prayer connects to the momentous events of U.S. history, such as the encounter of two cultures with the arrival of Columbus, the Revolution, the early days of the government, the Civil War, the Depression, the world wars and beyond. He looks at nearly every presidency to determine the impact prayer had on policy and policymakers. For instance, just as President George W. Bush recently called upon the nation to engage in a day of fasting and prayer for the victims of Hurricane Katrina, numerous other presidents have asked for God's aid on the country's behalf. Moore sifts many of the presidential papers to find instances where they invoked God's assistance in carrying out the duties of office or beseeched God to bless the nation.

The real strength of the work lies in the personalities that Moore says have contributed to a national ethos of prayer. Here we find Mother Elizabeth Seton and Babe Ruth (among the few Catholic references), Gen. George Patton and Harriet Tubman, T.S. Eliot and J. P. Morgan, Benjamin Franklin and Mary Pickford, Thelonius Monk and Reinhold Niebuhr. It is not impossible, but one must search harder in Moore's text to see all of the Jewish and Muslim, Buddhist and Hindu champions of prayer.

One wonders, also, about the prayers of the common person in time of peace. What were the Irish or Chinese immigrants praying as they drove the railroad spikes? How did people bury their dead or marry? What kind of common theology has arisen from so much popular hymnody or catechesis on prayer or its ritual enactment?

We do find in Moore's catalog some of the most touching prayers ever written. For me, none struck a more moving chord than a prayer now enshrined by the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. It was found by the liberators of Ravensbruck concentration camp on a scrap of paper near the body of a dead child:

"O Lord, remember not only the men and women of good will, but also those of ill will. But do not only remember all the suffering they have inflicted on us. Remember the fruits we brought, thanks to this suffering: our comradeship, our loyalty, our humility, our courage, our generosity, the greatness of heart which has come out of all this; and when they come to judgment, let all the fruits that we have borne be their forgiveness."

Moore leaves the future of prayer in the capable hands of today's youth who, he says, send their prayers as genuinely and devoutly as those of America's forebears. While reading Moore's book, I found myself listening more for prayer within our culture and especially in the lives of the students I teach. It is there in great numbers — sometimes silent but always active — adapting and reinventing its forms as the times demand.

Hayes teaches theology at Marymount College of Fordham University in Tarrytown, New York.

Preparing to enter God's kingdom

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The TV screen ushers us into a dimly lit room where an aged woman lies in a sea of voluminous white comforters, pillows and lace. The dim light in the room allows us to see some visitors, listening to the woman's soft, rambling words. The figure in the immense bed could be Dickens' Miss Havisham with her mass of disheveled silver hair.

We, the viewers, join the visitors to hear this matriarch as she begins to recount the achievements of a long and exciting life. Caught up in her recollections, she glances toward a television and sees a shot of a beautiful young woman preparing to step into an ultramodern bathtub.

Our matriarch falls back among the mounds of white linen. Disillusioned, she dies, knowing there is still something she does not possess.

Obviously, the intent of this clever TV commercial is to intensify consumer desire for upscale bathroom fixtures; it is not a treatise on preparation for death and dying.

The unintended message of this brief vignette provides a contrast with the readings for this first weekend in November. The readings for our Sunday liturgies are beginning to take on an apocalyptic tone and start to reflect the waning of another year.

In the Gospel, Jesus tells a parable to help us understand the necessity for being prepared for entering the kingdom of heaven. He describes 10 young women enduring an extended wait for the bridegroom. When he finally arrives, the five who have extra flasks of oil for their lamps are able to join him. The five without oil are locked outside in the dark and cannot be part of the celebration. Jesus does not describe the unfortunate five as bad people. However, they do not possess the wisdom to recognize the most essential preparation task for the wedding feast.

In his first letter to the Thessalonians, St. Paul assures us that the most important gift in life is faith in the risen Lord. For Paul, the fruition of all wisdom is to know Jesus and to have faith that God raised Jesus from the dead. The lasting achievement of a lifetime is to have looked forward to meeting the risen Lord and prepared well for the celebration.

'North Country' a gold mine of a film

A fitting tag line for director Niki Caro's sterling "North Country" (Warner Bros.) could have been: "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for justice, for they shall be satisfied." So shall those looking for a film with a compelling story and forceful performances.

Inspired by real events, "North Country" is a social-conscience drama along the lines of "Erin Brockovich," "Silkwood" and "Norma Rae." Like those films, it has a strong, central, working-class female character.

Charlize Theron stars in this compelling drama set in northern Minnesota about a struggling single mother of two (Theron), who takes a job at a local mine, and encounters hostility and abuse from the predominantly male ranks.

With the help of a sympathetic lawyer (Woody Harrelson), she eventually stands up for herself and her female co-workers (including Frances McDormand) by filing a landmark sexual harassment lawsuit against the mining company. Buttressed by an emotionally forceful performance by Theron, Caro's film avoids melodrama while touching on issues of gender discrimination, justice, family, community and human dignity.

Scenes of workplace harassment including lewd comments and humor plus obscene graffiti, groping and assorted other malicious mischief involving scatological and sex gags, implied spousal abuse, a suggested rape, and recurring rough and crude language and profanity. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is L — limited adult audience, films whose problematic content many adults would find troubling. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

'DREAMER: INSPIRED BY A TRUE STORY'

Warm and winning family film set in rural Kentucky about a dispirited race-horse trainer (Kurt Russell), his young daughter (Dakota Fanning) and estranged father (Kris Kristofferson), who nurse an injured Seabiscuit-like thoroughbred back to form and in the process mend their own broken relationships. Written and directed by John Gatins, the movie is a handsome and unapologetically sentimental old-fashioned crowd-pleaser, with tender performances by Fanning and Russell and heartfelt themes of family, the healing power of love and the importance of holding on to one's dreams. A few mildly rude expressions and a racetrack accident that may disturb sensitive young children. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-I — general patronage. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested.

'THE FOG'

Schlocky remake of John Carpenter's 1980 horror film about a cursed island community off Oregon enveloped by a sinister shroud of fog that brings with it the ghostly crew of an ill-fated ship returning to exact revenge on the locals (including Tom Welling, Maggie Grace and Selma Blair) for murderous crimes committed by the town's founding fathers. Directed by Rupert Wainwright, the new version pretty much follows the original's soggy B-movie lead, but, despite slicker effects and a bigger budget, it is mist-ifyingly less suspenseful this time around. Strong violence and gore, including flaming bodies, and an impaling with shards of glass, a sexual encounter, horror effects, and minimal crude language. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Bishop Begley Conference advocates environment protection

The conference, held at Living Waters Catholic Reflection Center in Maggie Valley Oct. 21-22, built on the first Bishop Begley Conference, held in 2003. The conference is named for Bishop Michael J. Begley, first bishop of the Diocese of Charlotte, and one of the signers of the 1975 document, "This Land is Home to Me: A Pastoral Letter on Powerlessness in Appalachia."

That letter and 1995's "At Home in the Web of Life: A Pastoral Message on Sustainable Community in Appalachia," both written by the Catholic bishops of Appalachia, are at the conferences' roots.

This year's conference called for focusing on local initiatives rather than dependence on the global economy, to live more simply and to stop practices that deplete the environment.

In addition to Sister McBrien, an ecology educator with the Appalachian Office of Justice and Peace, speakers included Anthony Flaccavento, executive director of Appalachian Sustainable Development (ASD); Robert Gronski, policy coordinator for the National Catholic Rural Life Conference; Dave Cooper, environmental activist; Jeff Brooks, marketing and communications coordinator of NC GreenPower; and Daria Gere, staff member of Save Our Cumberland Mountains.

Sister McBrien said she has been to many conferences on Catholic social teaching where "they never mention the environment. They say the documentation isn't there."

But, she said, documentation is in such works as bishops' pastoral statements and Pope John Paul II's Earth Day speech in 1990.

"At Home in the Web of Life," she said, "says we should build sustainable communities."

Building such communities was the subject of Flaccavento's presentation, "Sustainable Development in Appalachia: Diversifying and Strengthening the Region's Economy while Conserving the Environment."

Flaccavento's organization has helped create a sustainable infrastructure in agriculture and forestry in southwest Virginia and northeast Tennessee.

"We have to build strong local communities," he said. "Sustainability builds on what exists. For instance, teaching farmers to be as productive as possible, to rebuild the soil and make better use of the land."

ASD works with local loggers, who adhere to strict guidelines as to what they can cut. There is no clear-cutting (denuding forests), so woods and wildlife habitats aren't destroyed.

The logs are cut in a sustainable wood-processing center that produces 20 to 25 percent more wood per log than conventional sawmills. The wood is air dried, then dried in a solar kiln that uses no petroleum products.

In his workshop, "Local Food Circles," Gronski said that local cultures can be reclaimed through local food. Food circles include all the farmers within a 100-mile radius of any location. Thus people buying within the food circle get seasonal produce direct from local farmers.

"Earth isn't a planet with life on it, but with life in it," Sister McBrien said. It has a circulatory system (water) and lungs (plants). We are called to offer a new vision, for people to examine their consciences and their conduct."

must take numerous prescription medications. Recently, an official at the Mecklenburg County Health Department informed her that her Medicaid was cut off.

During a September home visit, Carmen Cruz, a social worker with New Horizons for Children and Families, learned about Cooper's loss of health coverage. She contacted the Health Department and had Cooper's Medicaid re-instated.

Thanks to New Horizons, Cooper and others like her now have a valuable resource of information, assistance and referral services.

Approximately 160,576 adults in North Carolina have grandchildren living with them full time.

These unique families exist for several reasons: death of the parent, drug dependence, imprisonment or inability to parent.

Catholic Social Services in the Diocese of Charlotte (CSS), in partnership with Smart Start of Mecklenburg County developed New Horizons, a program in support of grandparents and "kinship families" parenting children birth to five years of age. Kinship families are made of children and their guardians who are not their parents.

Fifteen families are already enrolled in the program, which was launched last July.

Social workers provide case management in assisting these families with services, which include monthly home visits, on-going parent education and referrals for assistance within CSS and appropriate community resources.

"The whole point of the program is support," said Colleen Cranford, project director for New Horizons. "We realize that these people parenting again can involve a lot of stress."

Home visits include an assessment of the safety of the household: cabinet locks, smoke alarms, proper storage of chemical-based cleaners. The counselor also assesses the physical and mental development of each child.

A licensed counselor is available to help strengthen these families with individual and family counseling along with therapeutic support groups for caretakers and for children. Parent education classes, which run for six weeks at a time focusing on age's birth to 12 years of age, are offered as well.

Cranford said that the needs of children from birth to 5 years old who are being raised by grandparents or older relatives are complex. These needs can only be addressed by a program such as New Horizons.

"CSS has the expertise to provide this safety net and in partnership with Smart Start, will provide these resources in Mecklenburg County," she said.

New Horizons staffers also will help grandparents navigate the confusing channels of the Department of Social Services and other agencies.

"It can be complicated to receive services at a lot of these places and the grandparents just don't understand," said Cranford. "Our job is to call and figure it out for them."

New Horizons for Children and Families is the only program in Mecklenburg County that provides comprehensive services including professional mental health intervention, parenting education and case management to benefit families in which children are being raised by older relatives.

To be eligible for the program, participants must live in Mecklenburg County, at least one child must be 5 years old or younger and the grandparents or guardians must be the primary caregivers and sole decision-makers.

Funding is assured only for the next two years, Cranford said. After that, CSS expects the program will receive continued funding for the future.

In the meantime, Margie Cooper and others like her are reaping the benefits of CSS and Smart Start.

News media code words: the shortcut to a small mind

I've always disliked clichés. I avoid these code words because I find them unimaginative crutches used by writers with feeble talent. But I once worked with a television producer who thought clichés were great. She said clichés are code words that express an easily understood point of view in a minimal amount of time.

"A stitch in time saves nine," I replied.

The problem with clichés is that they lack clarity. For example, the media often refers to a Catholic as "devout" or the more formal "devout Roman Catholic." Do "devout Catholics" ever miss Sunday Mass? Is a Catholic devout if, like Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia, he or she opposes abortion but supports capital punishment? Senator John Kerry's views are just the opposite. Is he devout?

Clichés can also be used to divide us.
Red State,
Blue State,
One you like,
One you hate.

The code word/cliché of the past few weeks has been "raised Catholic" when used in reference to Supreme Court nominee Harriet Miers. As reported on page 1, thanks to a deacon in the Diocese of Dallas who did the research, it has been cleared up that Ms. Miers was never a Catholic.

So what was the original intent of the wrongly reported cliché that Harriet Miers was "raised Catholic?" Inherent in those two words are these questions: What faith is she now? Did she reject Catholicism?

Those are very good questions, but unfortunately clichés don't provide answers. That opens the drain for speculation, which quickly clouds the important issue of the role that faith might play in a Supreme Court nominee's decision-making process.

Was "raised Catholic" intended as a wink to the fundamentalist community that she had "found" Jesus in an evangelical Protestant church and therefore somehow would be a fit justice for the Supreme Court? Catholics, as noted above, are divided on the issue of abortion, and the White House seems to want to make clear where Ms. Miers stands and therefore how she will vote in the event that she has the opportunity to overturn Roe v. Wade. But who knows — that's just one avenue of speculation that the code words opened.

DAVID HAINS

We Catholics are part of a diverse worldwide church. Our traditions go back 2,000 years. These twin towers make our beliefs hard to categorize. And that is a good thing. If someone thinks they know you or your faith via a cliché, than they miss the opportunity to truly understand something beautiful. The flame of faith that burns in each of us can provide warmth and light to others, but the light will remain under a basket if we don't get past the clichés.

Don't expect the general media to be a great deal of help. News organizations and pundits have a limited amount of time and space — 600 words for me. Code words can become irresistible shortcuts. The only way I've found to avoid falling into a cliché rut is to be exposed to varying viewpoints.

And so, if you subscribe to "America" magazine, visit the Web site of "Crisis" every now and then. You might think the sun rises over the editorial page of The New York Times, but remember, The Wall Street Journal can be pretty thought-provoking, too. Even better, have a discussion with a fellow Catholic, a Protestant, a Jew or a Muslim about God.

Yes, it will take a little longer to come to an informed opinion. But think about it, what's the rush?

If the shoe fits, wear it. There, that makes 600.

The Second Vatican Council's 40th anniversary

Forty years ago, on Dec. 8, 1965, the Second Vatican Council came to an end. Down through the decades most Catholics have applauded its many accomplishments. An angry minority thought it was a disaster. I belong to the first group, and I'll tell you why.

I think Pope John XXIII was the most outstanding church leader of the 20th century. He promoted a pastoral style of leadership that put charity first. He taught that the best way to counteract errors was by demonstrating the validity of the church's teaching through Christian charity: "There is nothing more effective than charity, in eradicating the seeds of discord, nothing more efficacious in promoting concord, a just peace and the brotherly unity of all."

I was only a seminarian when John XXIII was pope, and I admired him from afar. Cardinal Leon Joseph Suenens, the leader of the progressive wing of the council fathers, invited me to be his occasional secretary during the 1980s and 1990s when he came to the United States. I learned a lot about the workings of the council from him during those years.

Sixteen documents were written during the council under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and each one of them reflected Pope John's pastoral approach to leadership. Two in particular stood out as pivotal: The "Declaration on Religious Freedom," largely the result of the thinking of Jesuit Father John Courtney Murray (1904-1967), and "The Decree on Ecumenism," promoted in large part by theologian Father Hans Kung.

Past popes had condemned the very thought of religious freedom, but the council fathers found the courage and humility to reverse the ultraconservative "Syllabus of Errors," issued by Pope Pius IX in 1864. The church once demanded freedom for itself when it was in the minority but refused to grant it to others when they were in the minority, using the principle that "error has no rights." This principle was dropped when the teaching on religious freedom became more developed.

Today the church teaches that no one should be subject to coercion of any kind when it comes to the act of faith. The document on religious freedom also taught us that the church has the power to change some of its traditions.

The "Decree on Ecumenism" dealt with the problem of the reunification of all the Christian churches. New thinking on the dignity of the human person and freedom of conscience led to an entirely new approach to church unity.

The chief obstacle to reunion rests in the different concepts of the church. One view sees the church as an absolute monarchy; the other sees church authority as a collegial service. The council adopted the view that the authority of the pope and bishops henceforth would be considered a service to be implemented in a collegial mode.

We no longer see unity in terms of a return to Rome by the other churches, but rather as a restoration of all things to the Gospel of Jesus Christ. All parties have agreed to share the blame for the divisions among us. Pope John Paul II even went so far as to apologize publicly for the church's part in causing this division.

We are all working diligently to fulfill the mandate of Jesus, spoken at the Last Supper, "That all may be one."

Lessons from the Millions More Movement

As I walked along the Washington Mall in the nation's capital, I came upon a rally that was a sight for sore eyes: the Millions More Movement.

In 1995 a similar rally was held; an estimated 1 million people, most African American, attended. Though this year's crowd was much smaller, witnessing it was an awesome experience.

A number of the talks zeroed in on Hurricane Katrina and how poor African Americans were betrayed by America. They also addressed unemployment, equal rights, slavery, self-empowerment and a number of other social justice issues.

Interestingly, there was a strong emphasis on family unity, hence the reason for calling it the Millions More Movement, rather than the Million Man March.

This event's statement is one we have heard over and over: The poor people of New Orleans represented the pockets of poor people throughout this country who are neglected, forgotten and abandoned.

But why state the obvious? Because it is not obvious to everyone, especially people who live comfortably and have no sense of social justice. But this movement goes deeper than this.

The Human Side

The word "doubt" conveys the notion of paralysis, of an inability to move because of being caught between two conflicting possibilities. Too many Americans are still not convinced that we have desperately poor people in our big cities, suburbs and rural areas. They have yet to become believers and to act upon that belief.

Events like the Millions More Movement emphatically state that in the richest nation in the world, people must come to realize that we still have a long way to go in assuring the equality we champion and giving the care to each person that we tout.

A determined woman — worker for the Lord

Back in the early 1950s, Hollywood made a movie called "Come to the Stable" with Loretta Young and Celeste Holm playing two penniless nuns who came to America from France at the end of World War II to found a hospital for children.

It was a fictionalized version of a story that was much more powerful in fact. The real-life woman played by Young was Mother Benedict Duss, an American-born graduate of a medical school in Paris, a nun at the Benedictine Abbey at Jouarre in France and a fugitive from the Gestapo. More than that, she was a faith-motivated, courageous pioneer determined to found a Benedictine monastery for women in America as her way of thanking this country for liberating her abbey in France.

In the decades that followed the movie until her death Oct. 2, 2005, at age 94, Mother Duss was the first to acknowledge what a tempestuous 60-plus years this had been for her as the maverick foundress of the Abbey of Regina Laudis in Bethlehem, Conn. She had to face poverty, trauma, setbacks, success, failure, physical illness, sometimes harsh accusations — but always she had fidelity and love from her "daughters," every one of whom I call "my sisters."

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO
CNS COLUMNIST

I visit them often at their abbey, some 45 of them, all professionals who have taken vows making them members of this first cloistered Benedictine community of women to be established in the United States. These women wear a traditional habit and live according to a rule written for community life by St. Benedict in the sixth century.

But that's just the overview. What has been established here is a model that was expected to fail — building a monastery on American ground for American women, based on a 1,500-year-old rule.

But Mother Benedict was no ordinary woman. The work she did for her community and the villagers of Jouarre put her in great jeopardy after the Americans entered World War II and the Germans occupying France declared all Americans their "enemies."

She became a fugitive from the Gestapo and somehow escaped arrest. At the liberation of Jouarre by the Americans, Mother Benedict had something of a mystical experience, leading her to promise then and there that she would thank her birth country for this liberation by founding a monastery in America.

How she convinced the Vatican that this was a viable project is a tale of a strong woman facing up to powerful men and winning. She also had the coincidental luck of finding some American women, notably artist Lauren Ford, who offered her and her companion, Mother Mary Aline, hospitality and a place to start at their home in a tiny town called, appropriately, Bethlehem in the hills of Connecticut.

Much attention came their way after Hollywood made the movie, and even more eyes were on this abbey when a beautiful blonde star named Dolores Hart left Hollywood and entered the community in 1963 — known and beloved these many years as Mother Dolores.

In a time when religious orders are dying, Regina Laudis, founded by a strong woman who so respected the individuality of women, swims against the tide with a thriving community.

What makes a happy marriage?

Our Turn

THERESE J. BORCHARD
CNS COLUMNIST

Good communication was one of the many secrets to happy marriages when I interviewed hundreds of couples for my book "I Like Being Married."

Says my husband on communication: "You continue to ask each other how her day was, you send a quick e-mail, you take time to have lunch once in awhile."

Among the other secrets to happy marriages were these:

Forgiveness. "Without forgiveness, love has no meaning," says best-selling author Marianne Williamson. "It has no fullness or maturity. Only when two people have shown each other the worst side of our natures are we truly ready for the task of love," she says. Ruth Bell Graham, wife of evangelist Billy Graham since 1943, says, "A happy marriage is the union of two good forgivers."

Compassion. "Love often makes itself visible in pain," said Father Henri Nouwen, a noted spirituality writer. "Good marriages don't just happen," says Tipper Gore, married to former Vice President Al Gore since 1970. "They take a lot of love and a lot of work. When things get rough, you don't just cut and run." Actor Christopher Reeve said: "We made a bargain for life. I got the better end of the deal."

Familiarity and friendship. "Familiarity breeds content," says Leach. "Familiarity is knowing someone so well that you both say the same surprising things at the same time and feel the love in the laughter that follows. It is being so close to the other that you think her thoughts and feel her feelings at the same time she thinks and feels them," he says.

Vulnerability. "Before I met my husband, I was always kind of private and had doubts about the wisdom of opening myself up too much," says Kathleen Walsh of Upper Saddle River, N.J. "Gradually, though, we learned about giving 100 percent, and about deciding to love, and about finding the energy and patience, and about becoming vulnerable," she says.

Perseverance. "In every marriage there are horrible, hurtful, 'I don't know if I can stand one more minute of this pain' moments," says Judy Markey of Chicago. "But you get through them. You get through them because fundamentally you know there is something worth salvaging. ... Because you believe fiercely in the worthiness of the imperfect union," she says.

Fun. "When I first met John, I couldn't believe life could be this much fun," says actress Kelly Preston, married to actor John Travolta since 1991. "There's always a game to play and something fun to do — a way to look at life with joyous eyes," she says.

And, of course, there is prayer.

Your faith is yours

Don't be fooled. They are not there to be your friends. They are not there to have an open discussion. They are not there to hang out. They are not truly interested in your daily life. Don't be fooled.

I walked down the winding Dublin streets, listening to my MP3 player and feeling loneliness along with excitement. I felt the crisp Irish fall air along with the heat under my jacket from my walking. I focused on the downtown skyline, using it as a target, turning left, then right, allowing it to guide me.

I had left the United States a couple months earlier, visited a friend in Germany and then headed to Dublin to begin writing. I had been there a week, sleeping and reading quietly in a room at a hostel converted from a convent, but still operated by nuns.

On the winding streets, songs brought me back home, music filled my insides with a yearning for family and friends who, the last time I listened to those tunes, were with me.

In the distance I saw two young men in suits, ties and badges walking down the road. Being from Utah and recognizing their religious affiliation, I crossed the street to say hello.

"Hey, where are you guys from?" I asked, hoping to talk about home, hoping to bring up restaurants we all may have frequented, guessing they would like to talk to someone who grew up near them too, as the majority of Utah's population lives in one northern area along the Wasatch front. They told me that they grew up less than 15 miles from where I grew up.

"That's great! What do you guys miss about it?" I asked, expecting to talk about the mountains or the fishing or the mountain biking.

They responded, "Have you ever been introduced to the LDS faith?" This shocked me. I thought, like me, they would be happy to meet somebody from home.

"Yeah, yeah I have," I disappointingly responded.

"Would you like to learn more? We would like to set up a moment to discuss it further with you."

I said, disguising my frustration and responding nicely, "No thanks, I am a practicing Catholic, and I'm not interested." I turned and headed down the street, continuing toward my landmark horizon.

Your faith is yours. Your beliefs are yours. If missionaries from other faiths try to make you doubt your faith, that is their way in.

Missionaries of any faith tend to be kind, good-hearted people. But there are some whose only goal is to convert you away from your faith to theirs. Don't be fooled by friendly inquiring. There are very few things that I am downright pessimistic about, but this is one of them.

It's OK to have doubts, to have questions and to seek answers. But if you have doubts, talk to your parents, priest, teachers, but not to someone with an ulterior motive — not one whose aim is to find a hole in your faith and to fill it in with something quite different.

St. Vincent de Paul a thriving parish for 40 years

In less than 50 years, St. Vincent de Paul Church has established itself as the spiritual home for many south Charlotte Catholics.

CHARLOTTE — The parish of St. Vincent de Paul Church traces its roots back to Jan. 23, 1961, when Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh purchased eight acres of land on Old Reid Road. He planned to establish a parish and parochial school on these acres.

A gymnasium went up first, to be used as a temporary chapel until the church and/or school could be built. Little did the church leaders suspect that the gymnasium would become the church itself for almost 40 years.

On Oct. 29, 1961, Bishop Waters dedicated St. Vincent de Paul as a mission church of St. Ann Church. In the early 1960s, the population of Charlotte was growing rapidly, as was its Catholic community.

On July 9, 1965, Bishop Waters proclaimed St. Vincent de Paul Church a parish in its own right with Father James Noonan as the first pastor. The following year, the parish family added a social hall to its existing facilities, with a cry room, a kitchen and meeting space for the many church activities. The ladies of the parish formed the Women's Guild to help the church meet its needs.

The remainder of the decade saw growth in many areas. In 1966, Father Noonan began a kindergarten in the parish social hall, and two years later the parishioners elected the first parish council.

When Father Noonan left St. Vincent de Paul Church in July 1971 to begin a new assignment, Msgr. John Rouche was appointed pastor. He initiated a Saturday evening Mass and began sponsoring the Girl Scouts.

A year and a half after coming to St. Vincent de Paul Church, Msgr. Rouche was reassigned and the parish welcomed Father Vincent Stokes as its third pastor. His years saw further changes. The acreage purchased earlier was sold off, as the diocese decided the facilities planned for the land were no longer needed.

The parish added a new wing to provide additional seating for Mass, as well as class and meeting rooms, a nursery and a religious education office. Also during these years, the parish established the craft group, chartered a cub pack and Boy Scout troop and began publishing a newsletter.

When Father Stokes left, Father Joseph Waters became the fourth pastor.

Father Mark S. Lawlor

He had dreamed for a long time of establishing a group to help those in crises, and during his tenure a group of men and women formed the St. Vincent de Paul Society to do just that. This ministry continues today for the same purpose.

In August 1977, Msgr. William Wellein became St. Vincent's fifth pastor. He oversaw a number of physical improvements to the church property. During this time, St. Vincent de Paul Church began ecumenical participation with the other Park Sharon-area churches in celebrating joint Thanksgiving and Lenten services, and the semi-annual Rosary Rally took root when the observance of International Rosary Day began in 1978.

A number of ministries began during the tenure of the next pastor, Msgr. Felix Kelaher, who arrived in September 1984: Knights of Columbus Council 9560, the Visitation Ministry, St. Vincent de Paul Preschool and the adult faith formation classes (RCIA). Under his direction, the parish organized a committee to plan a new church complex.

When Msgr. William Pharr took over as pastor in June 1991, he guided the parish through the important undertaking of renovating and adding to the existing buildings, including a renovation of the church.

As work began on the church, parishioners moved into the newly built activity center for Masses. On Feb. 27, 1999, then-Bishop William G. Curlin dedicated the new church.

Msgr. Pharr also introduced a youth-oriented Mass, the ACES group for senior citizens, and the parish picnic. When he retired in July 2001, the parish dedicated the activity center to him, renaming it in his honor.

Father Mark Lamprich assumed the pastorate when Msgr. Pharr retired in 2001, and added two houses to the church holdings. One serves as a rectory, and the other as a youth house.

Father Mark Lawlor was assigned as pastor in July 2003. In the past two years, two additional adjacent homes were purchased that increase available parish meeting space. There are plans for a columbarium to be constructed on the church property in the near future. To provide for the pastoral care for the large numbers of Hispanic Catholics living within the parish, Father Mark instituted a weekly Mass in Spanish in December 2003.

The parish of St. Vincent de Paul Church has come a long way from the mission church gymnasium. Through the work of many hands and with God's blessing, it has grown into a thriving parish.

Editor's note: This is the first in a series examining Vatican's II legacy.

VATICAN CITY — Forty years after the close of the Second Vatican Council, the deep transformation it set in motion continues to reverberate through the church at every level, from the halls of the Vatican to the pews of local parishes.

The council's four sessions from 1962 to 1965 and its 16 landmark documents modernized the liturgy,

Pope says Vatican II underlined special Christian-Jewish ties

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI said the Second Vatican Council had rightly underlined the special ties between Christians and Jews, while expressing respect for Muslims and followers of other religions.

"The council fathers confirmed the spirit of universal brotherhood that forbids any type of religious discrimination or persecution," he said.

RING OF GENEROSITY

Msgr. Douglas Doussan, pastor of St. Gabriel the Archangel Church in New Orleans, holds up a wedding ring that was left in a donor envelope at St. Lawrence of Brindisi Church in Los Angeles. A woman who said she had no money to offer left the gold ring saying it was for the victims of Hurricane Katrina. The pastor of the Los Angeles church sought out the parish most in need of help and contacted Msgr. Doussan.

Collection at Los Angeles parish yields gift for Katrina victims

BATON ROUGE, La. (CNS) — The second collection taken up at St. Lawrence of Brindisi Church in the Watts section of Los Angeles, earmarked for Hurricane Katrina victims, contained an unusual donation.

St. Lawrence is an inner-city church of 3,000 families, about 80 percent Hispanic and 20 percent African-American. They are people of "very modest means," said Capuchin Franciscan Father Peter Banks, pastor.

A recent second collection contained a stunning gift left by an anonymous donor: a woman's wedding ring that eventually was sent to a New Orleans church hit by floodwater 8 feet deep after Katrina.

In a church donation envelope, someone left a message hand-printed in Spanish: "For the victims of the hurricane. I did not bring any money. But this should be of some value. It is with all of my heart."

When Father Banks opened the envelope, he saw a gold wedding ring with small notches on the outside.

"My immediate reaction was, what incredible kindness and charity this woman had," he said. "This woman had nothing and she reached down on her hand and took off her ring. ... This was all she had, and she gave it with all her heart."

For several days, Father Banks carried the ring with him in his shirt pocket to remind him of the woman's generosity. But he knew the ring and its story had to be shared.

"I didn't want to part with it, but it was not mine — it belonged to New Orleans," Father Banks said.

The following weekend the priest shared the story with his parishioners, many of whom have Louisiana relatives.

"I wanted people to know what happened," Father Banks said. "There are saints living within our midst. Our parishioners do relate to tragedy and suffering."

Father Banks then began searching on the Internet for a parish in the Archdiocese of New Orleans that might need direct help recovering from the devastating storm. He came across Msgr. Douglas Doussan's name and made contact with the pastor of St. Gabriel Church in Pontchartrain Park. The church had been flooded by water 8 feet deep.

"It's incredible that people are willing to make such a sacrifice to help those who are traumatized," said Msgr. Doussan. "She obviously was not giving out of her surplus but out of her want."

New study finds lay ecclesial ministry still growing in United States

Major improvements in pay for ministers since 1990

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A new national study reports that there are now nearly 31,000 paid lay parish ministers and more than 2,000 others who work in parish ministry at least 20 hours a week on a volunteer basis.

The study found that since 1990 there have been major improvements in pay for the paid ministers. It also found striking advances since 1990 in the involvement of dioceses in the training, screening, certification and commissioning of lay parish ministers, in providing them with continuing education and in setting employment standards and salary ranges for them.

"For the first time in the history of our country, there are more paid professional lay ministers in our parishes than there are priests," said Father Eugene F.

Lauer, director of the National Pastoral Life Center in New York, which conducted the study.

It was commissioned by the Committee on the Laity of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and funded by the Lilly Endowment.

The Committee on the Laity's Subcommittee on Lay Ministry has incorporated findings from the study into a resource document on lay ecclesial ministry that the U.S. bishops are being asked to approve when they meet in Washington in mid-November. An executive summary of the study along with commentaries on it appears as a special insert in the fall issue of Church, a quarterly publication of the center.

The two previous studies were conducted in 1990 and 1997.

Vatican condemns statement against Israel, new Holy Land violence

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican condemned a new round of violence in the Holy Land and said recent statements questioning Israel's right to exist were "unacceptable."

The Vatican statement was issued Oct. 28, two days after Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad denounced the policies of Israel and said the country should be "wiped off the map." His comments drew widespread criticism and calls by some for sanctions against Iran.

Without mentioning Iran by name, the Vatican statement said it firmly condemned "certain statements, particularly serious and unacceptable, in which Israel's right to exist is denied."

"The Holy See reaffirms on this occasion the right of both Israelis and Palestinians to live in peace and security, each in their own sovereign state," it said.

The Vatican expressed its condemnation of recent acts of violence in the Holy Land "from whatever side they originate," including a Palestinian terrorist attack in Hadera Oct. 26 and an Israeli reprisal raid the next day.

A Palestinian militant group claimed responsibility for the attack in Hadera, which killed five Israeli troops; the group said the attack was in retaliation for Israel's killing of an Islamic militant. Israel in turn retaliated with a missile attack in Gaza that killed four militants and three bystanders.

The Vatican urged all leaders of the Middle East to "listen to the yearning for peace and justice that springs from their populations and avoid acts or choices that lead to division and death."

"They should commit themselves with courage and determination to creating the minimum conditions necessary for a resumption of dialogue, which is the only way that will assure a future of peace and prosperity to the children of that land," it said.

Pope tells Christians to think of 'death without fear'

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Christians can cultivate a fearless acceptance of death, recognizing that it is a necessary juncture leading from one's journey on earth to one's final destination in heaven, said Pope Benedict XVI.

Observing the Nov. 1 feast of All Saints and anticipating the Nov. 2 feast of All Souls, Pope Benedict said these days of offering prayers for departed loved ones can help Christians "think of the mystery of death without fear."

"New life, received through baptism, is not subject to the corruption and power of death," he said Nov. 1 before praying his midday Angelus.

For Christians, "death is a gateway from the earthly pilgrimage to the home of heaven, where the Father welcomes all his children of every nation, race, people and tongue," he said.

He called on Christians to include some time during the two feast days to "think about the mystery of death without fear and cultivate that constant awareness that prepares us to face (death) with serenity."

Pope Benedict told thousands of visitors gathered in St. Peter's Square on the feast of All Saints, an Italian public holiday, that the day offers the opportunity "to experience the joy of being part of the large family of God's friends."

The communion of saints is "a family united by deep bonds of spiritual solidarity, which unite the deceased faithful to the world's pilgrims," he said.

This bond is "mysterious, but real" and is fostered "by prayer and participating in the sacrament of the Eucharist," the pope said.

The souls of all the faithful "overcome the barrier of death" and are united in the Eucharist, he said.

Pope Benedict said he would be spiritually united to all those visiting cemeteries Nov. 2, saying he would be "in prayer at the popes' tombs in the Vatican grotto" with "a special remembrance of the beloved John Paul II."

Secular Carmelites welcome new members at annual retreat

DURHAM — The Order of Secular Discalced Carmelites is growing in the Diocese of Charlotte.

The order's Flower of Carmel Community in Asheville honored several of its members at Masses held during its annual retreat at the Avila Retreat Center in Durham Oct. 21-23.

Cynthia Blum, a parishioner of St. Barnabas Church in Arden, made her final promises to the order superiors and community gathered. She promised a life of evangelical perfection in the spirit of the Evangelical Counsels of chastity, poverty and obedience and to the Beatitudes for the rest of her life.

Blum's vows were the culmination of more than five years of spiritual discernment, formation and study of the order's saints and way of life.

After 10 months of discernment, Jim and Loretta Potts, parishioners of St. Barnabas Church, were received into the community to begin their five years of study and formation. They were clothed in large brown scapulars, the habit of the order.

Discalced Carmelite Father Theodore Centala of the Carmelite monastery in Brighton, Mass., celebrated both Masses and officiated at both ceremonies.

Father Centala previously was the provincial delegate of the order's Washington province, which includes North Carolina.

The Secular Order of Discalced Carmelites is an order of lay people and diocesan priests who embrace a calling to strive for Christian perfection in the world according to the spirit and ideals of the Order of Discalced Carmelites.

Following in the way of St. Teresa of Avila and St. John of the Cross, Secular Carmelites endeavor to make their lives as grace-filled and fruitful as possible in every way for the whole church and the world.

The court, the first in North Carolina, also celebrates its 85th anniversary. During the event, a 50-year pin was given to Bernice Fowler, the oldest member of Court Asheville 412.

From its inception in 1903, Catholic Daughters of the Americas has grown and developed into the largest organization of Catholic women in the Americas, with representatives in Puerto Rico, Dominican Republic, Mexico, Virgin Islands, Guam and Saipan. Under the patronage of the Blessed Mother, its members are united by their faith in Jesus Christ, in their devotion to the Catholic Church and the Holy See.

Catholic Daughters is open to Catholic lay and religious women, 18 years of age or older, who want to support the Catholic Church and participate in social and charitable activities.

Knights and ladies

Eight from Charlotte honored in Washington ceremonies

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Eight members of the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem, all from the Diocese of Charlotte, recently received distinction.

Cardinal William H. Keeler of Baltimore promoted Cleatus Tate, a parishioner of the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville, to the rank of Knight Commander with Gold Star and Alice Cella, also of the Basilica of St. Lawrence and the order's regional representative, to the rank of Lady Commander during the order's annual investiture ceremonies in Washington, D.C., Oct. 14-15.

During a Mass Oct. 15, Cardinal Keeler invested into the order Peter Fredrick Asmer, Jr., a parishioner of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, and Rita Maria Jimenez Witt, a parishioner of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte, with the titles of knight and lady, respectively.

Other members from the Diocese of Charlotte were recognized during the ceremonies. Cardinal Keeler presented scrolls from Rome attesting to the previous promotion to knight commander and lady commander to Guillermo Calles and Helen Antoinette Calles (posthumously) of the Basilica of St. Lawrence.

Jane and Michael Balbirnie, parishioners of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, and Phillip Eugene Witt, a parishioner of St. Gabriel Church, also were presented with scrolls authenticating their investiture into the papal order in November 2004.

The order is a philanthropic organization that works to promote and protect the Catholic faith in the Holy Land. There are 57 members of the order in the Diocese of Charlotte, including Bishop Peter J. Jugis and Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin.

Membership is considered one of the highest papal awards conferred upon clergy and laity alike.

Celebrating love and marriage

'MARRIAGE IS A SACRAMENT, A COVENANT, A VOCATION, A WAY OF SALVATION.'

— BISHOP PETER J. JUGIS

years of marriage this year. One couple, Harry and Martha Barnhardt of St. Joseph Church in Kannapolis, celebrated 64 years of marriage; another couple, Edwin and Kitty Shaver, also of St. Joseph Church, celebrated 60 years of marriage.

Bishop Jugis called the event a "marvelous celebration of God's faithfulness and grace."

"You are the living signs that marriage and family life are alive and well," said Bishop Jugis. "The love and respect of the entire Catholic Church community are extended to you today in the solemn celebration of the anniversary of your union in the sacrament of matrimony."

Bishop Jugis said a lasting marriage demands love and loyalty, deep faith in God's grace, great hope that becomes a source of strength and refuge, and an ever-growing love for God and mankind.

"Christ invited you to build your marriages on a solid foundation, that being Christ himself, the foundation of the church," said the bishop.

"Because you accepted that invitation, we are able to celebrate your anniversaries here today," he said. "Without Christ, it would not be possible."

Christ showed mankind how to love, said Bishop Jugis.

"It is Christ's love that has taught us really how to love, with a love that is concerned for the well-being of the other," he said. "Without Christ, love becomes a self-centered love."

The true love of marriage is meant to be shared, said Bishop Jugis.

"The love which God has given you to share in marriage he means for you to share with others, so they too can know the love Christ meant for the world," he said.

Bishop Jugis encouraged the couples to attend Mass together.

"When you attend Mass, you return to the source and strength of your marriages — Christ's love," he said.

Capuchin Franciscan Father Ignatius Zampino, pastor of St. Thomas Aquinas Church, concelebrated the Mass. Deacon Mark Nash assisted, with Father Christopher Roux serving as master of ceremonies.

After the bishop's homily, the couples faced each other as they renewed their marriage vows. Their promises were then sealed with a kiss.

"Marriage is a sacrament, a covenant, a vocation, a way of salvation," said Bishop Jugis. "I thank you for the privilege of sharing in your love and joy today."

Father Aloysius D'Silva, retired priest of diocese, dies at 69

HIGH POINT — Father Aloysius Joseph D'Silva, a retired priest of the Diocese of Charlotte, died in High Point on Wednesday, Oct. 26. Father D'Silva, 69, was a resident of Pennybyrn at Maryfield retirement center in High Point.

A funeral Mass was celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis at Maryfield Chapel Oct. 31. In accord with Father D'Silva's wishes, he was cremated. Inurnment is at Our Lady of Perpetual Help Church Cemetery in Mumbai, India.

"Father D'Silva's devotion to the Mass will always remain my most vivid memory of his priestly ministry," said Bishop Jugis.

"Even as his eyesight was failing him in recent years, he made sure that the Mass remained an important part of his life by having large-print copies prepared of the text of the Mass," he said. "In that way, he always stayed close to the Lord."

Father D'Silva was born in Mumbai March 20, 1936 and was ordained to the priesthood Oct. 18, 1961. He continued his studies and received a degree in psycho-pedagogy from Salesianum University in Rome, degrees in pastoral counseling from Iona College in New York and a degree in professional studies from New School for Social Research in New York.

Father D'Silva came to the Diocese of Charlotte in 1993 and served as pastor of St. Lucien Church in Spruce Pine and St. Bernadette Church in Linville. During his pastorate, an active faith formation program was developed at St. Lucien Church.

"I give of myself 200 percent because of the love of my ministry," said Father D'Silva in a 1999 interview with The Catholic News & Herald.

"I try to be available for the people; moreover, I feel very enthused and grateful to the good Lord for being able to do what I can," he said.

In 2002, Father D'Silva became chaplain of Pennybyrn at Maryfield, where he resided until his death.

Memorials to honor Father D'Silva may be directed to the Priests' Education Fund, Diocese of Charlotte, 1123 S. Church St., Charlotte, N.C. 28203.

Vatican II's Christian-Jewish ties

The pope made the remarks at a Sunday blessing Oct. 30 from his apartment window above St. Peter's Square, which was crowded with more than 50,000 visitors.

As the church prepares to celebrate the 40th anniversary of the close of Vatican II, the pope asked Catholics to look again at several of the landmark documents approved in the final weeks of the council.

Among them was "Nostra Aetate," the Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, which the pope said was extremely relevant today.

He said the document begins from the principle that "all men form but one community," and that the church has a duty to foster unity and charity among peoples.

It goes on to say that the church "rejects nothing of what is true and holy in other religions," the pope said. At the same time, it makes clear that the church announces Christ to all people as "the way, the truth and the life" in which people find "the fullness of their religious life," he said.

Among other Vatican II documents, the pope said the Declaration on Christian Education has particular relevance today. It emphasizes the importance of an educational system that recognizes the primacy of man as a person, open to truth and goodness, he said.

All the documents of Vatican II deserve a new look, he said, because they "maintain their value and reveal a timeliness that, in some ways, has increased."

He asked Catholics to join him in praying to Mary to help all Christians "keep alive the spirit of the Second Vatican Council."

Vatican II trivia: Dates, documents and designated experts

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — On Jan. 25, 1959, Pope John XXIII announced plans to convoke the Second Vatican Council. It was the 21st ecumenical council in church history.

During the council's four sessions, from 1962 to 1965, there were 147 reports and 2,212 speeches read, as well as 4,361 written interventions.

In 1962, there were 2,908 eligible council fathers. The average daily attendance of bishops was 2,200. There were 460 officially designated experts, including 235 diocesan priests, 45 Jesuits, 42

Dominicans and 15 Franciscans.

The council had 168 general meetings, plus 10 plenary sessions.

The first session ran Oct. 11-Dec. 8, 1962, and included 36 general meetings. Pope John presided.

The second session, Sept. 29-Dec. 4, 1963, included 43 general meetings. Pope Paul VI presided over that and subsequent sessions.

The third session, Sept. 14-Nov. 21, 1964, included 48 general meetings.

The fourth and final session, Sept. 14-Dec. 8, 1965, included 41 general meetings.

Only eight U.S. bishops still alive who attended Vatican II

BY JERRY FILTEAU
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Forty years after the final session of the Second Vatican Council, only eight U.S. bishops who participated in its deliberations and voted on its documents are still alive.

Two were named bishops by Pope Pius XII, four by Pope John XXIII and two by Pope Paul VI.

Retired Auxiliary Bishop Charles G. Maloney, 93, of Louisville, Ky., and retired Archbishop Philip M. Hannan of New Orleans, 92, are the only remaining U.S. bishops who were named by Pope Pius XII. They were ordained bishops in 1955 and 1956, respectively.

At the age of 95, retired Bishop Marion F. Forst of Dodge City, Kan., is the oldest living U.S. bishop. Pope John XXIII named him a bishop in 1960.

The other three named by Pope John are:

— Retired Bishop Charles A. Buswell of Pueblo, Colo., 92. He was ordained a bishop in 1959.

— Retired Archbishop Raymond G. Hunthausen of Seattle, 84, who was ordained a bishop in 1962.

— Retired Maronite Archbishop Francis M. Zayek of St. Maron of Brooklyn, N.Y., 85. Born in Cuba, he was ordained a bishop in 1962 and was serving as an auxiliary bishop for Maronites in Brazil during the council years. He was made bishop of Maronites in the United States in 1971.

Two still-living U.S. bishops were named during the council years by Pope Paul VI and were able to attend part of the council.

Retired Auxiliary Bishop John J. Ward of Los Angeles, 85, was ordained a bishop in December 1963 and attended the council's 1964 and 1965 sessions.

Retired Bishop Loras J. Watters of Winona, Minn., 90, was ordained a bishop in August 1965 and attended the council's final session that fall.

Vatican II: Forty years later

renewed the priesthood and religious life, enhanced the role of lay Catholics, opened dialogue with other churches and non-Christians, and identified the church as the "people of God" attuned to the problems and hopes of the world.

Although the council defined no new dogma, Catholics who lived through the Vatican II era will never forget the changes — some of them abrupt — that visited their church communities in the mid-1960s.

Altars were turned around so that priests faced the people. The Mass in Latin gave way to Mass in the vernacular. Other sacraments were updated and simplified. Men and women religious adopted a more modern form of dress.

Not all the changes were immediate, however. Church leaders began a long and sometimes contentious process of revising nearly every area of pastoral life, from the teaching of religion to lay ministries.

"The council represented a Copernican revolution for the church, which challenged itself by asking how it could reopen a dialogue with the modern world," said Father Dario Vitali, who teaches church history at Rome's Gregorian University.

"Through the council, the church drew closer to contemporary men and women and made the Gospel meaningful to them," said Father Vitali. "If there had been no Vatican II, I think the church today would be a small minority, closed off in rites incomprehensible to the modern mentality."

Not everyone in the church sees the council as a positive thing. Some Catholics are still nostalgic for the old ways of worship, and at times some church officials — including several in Rome — have criticized the way Vatican II has been understood and implemented. In many cases, the ongoing debate reflects issues that were argued heatedly on the floor of the council.

History and direction

Dec. 8 marks the anniversary of the close of the council in 1965, and this fall Rome and the Vatican are hosting several commemorative encounters to reflect on how far the church has come over the last four decades.

Pope Benedict XVI, who participated in the council as a theological expert, is expected to speak about the importance of the council's documents. Although he has criticized some postconciliar changes, the pope has made it clear that Vatican II will be the "compass" of his papacy. The compass, of course, sets direction; it will be up to the new pope to provide the details.

The pope also has emphasized that implementation of the council is an ongoing task in the church, not just something that happened 40 years ago. One goal is to make sure Vatican II is not viewed as ancient history by young generations of Catholics.

"Younger Catholics may not be as intellectually aware of the council, but they are continually experiencing its effects," said Alberto Melloni, a church historian of the Vatican II period.

Before the liturgical changes of the Second Vatican Council, Catholics received the Eucharist by approaching and kneeling at the Communion rail. This photo was taken during Mass at the Paulist Center in Boston in 1955.

"Thanks to the council, young people have been taught to see the world not simply as a threat to Christian life, but as an opportunity to announce the Gospel," Melloni said.

Vatican II is sometimes described as a revolution, but it did not appear out of the blue. There had been 20 previous ecumenical councils in the church's history, including the First Vatican Council in 1869-70. Vatican I defined the dogmas of papal infallibility and the primacy of papal jurisdiction, but the council was suspended when war broke out in Europe, and it never resumed.

The theological ferment of the mid-20th century helped lay the groundwork for Vatican II. Pioneering theologians like Dominican Father Yves Congar and Jesuit Fathers John Courtney Murray and Henri de Lubac were trying to build bridges between Christianity's ancient truths and the contemporary world. All three were silenced in some fashion by the Vatican during the 1950s, but re-emerged to become important voices of the council.

Pope John XXIII surprised almost everyone when, after only three months as pontiff, he announced he was convening the council. The pope spoke of the need to update the church and promote Christian unity; above all, he said, he wanted to show the modern world that the church had been transformed and intellectually reinvigorated.

Pope John said the world was marked by spiritual poverty and needed the church's vitality. But, as he later told the council, the church wanted to offer the modern world the "medicine of mercy" and not severe condemnations.

Back to the sources

Preparation for the council took almost three years, and Pope John, already diagnosed with cancer when it began, presided over only the first of four annual autumn sessions in 1962. The invitation to Protestants, Orthodox and other non-Catholics to attend had already made Vatican II a historic event.

Pope Paul VI guided the completion of the council's work, presiding over the other three sessions and directing the important follow-up work in areas of liturgy, ecumenism, religious life and evangelization.

Between 2,000 and 2,500 bishops attended each Vatican II session, and participants have said the debates ranged from free-wheeling to finely tuned, with verbal skirmishes not uncommon. To give just one example, when the first draft of the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church ("Lumen Gentium") was presented, it was roundly criticized as triumphal, clerical and legalistic; the document was adopted two years and many amendments later.

From the beginning, bishops recognized that their task was not just updating church practices but also a process of "ressourcement," or going back to the sources of the faith.

There was a sense among participants that they were indeed making history, said Bishop Frank Fernando of Chilaw, Sri Lanka, one of a handful of still-active bishops to have participated in a session of the council.

"The debate was very systematic, with a great exchange of ideas. The documents would come back again and again with amendments, which the bishops would study. That's why these are very polished documents — it was not just a matter of bringing them in one day and passing them the next," Bishop Fernando said.

Major accomplishments

In the end, the council issued four constitutions: on the liturgy, the church's structure and nature, on the church in the modern world and on divine revelation.

It produced nine decrees: on the church and the media, ecumenism, Eastern Catholic churches, bishops, priestly formation, religious life, the laity, priestly ministry and missionary activity. It issued three declarations: on non-Christian religions, Christian education and religious freedom.

Most experts list the council's biggest achievement as a new way of understanding the church — as the "people of God" and not simply a hierarchical structure, and as a "sacrament" to the world with an active mission in all sectors of human society.

"Lumen Gentium" presented the church as a mystery and a communion of baptized believers moving toward heaven as one body that is holy, yet imperfect while on earth.

Although organized hierarchically, the church as a communion is a living body whose individual members are called to holiness and who each have specific roles, rights and responsibilities, the document said.

The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World ("Gaudium et Spes") was written more for the average reader and was approved in 1965, during the council's last vote.

Bishop Fernando remembers the moment well, and he said he considers "Gaudium et Spes" the most important thing to come out of the council. He said many bishops thought the council had spoken in previous documents primarily to experts and specialists and wanted this document to communicate a message to the whole world.

"Gaudium et Spes" called on the church to engage in dialogue with contemporary society and its problems, bringing church teaching and moral values to bear on a world too often torn by hatred, war and injustice. The document acknowledged that science and culture have things to teach the church, but also said the church has a mission to sanctify the world around it.

Many changes

In the years after its close, the renewal outlined by the council was refined and codified in a number of decrees, norms and changes in canon law. The church witnessed countless changes:

— The new Roman Missal was issued in 1970, with a new cycle of readings designed to offer a richer selection of Scripture. The liturgical calendar was simplified. The rites for sacraments were revised, emphasizing the communal aspects of their celebration. The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults was revived and reformed.

As the changes took place, active liturgical participation increased dramatically in many local church communities.

— Lay ministries multiplied. Lay readers and lay ministers of Communion appeared during Mass. Laity were represented on parish councils and diocesan boards, and lay men and women, many with theology degrees, replaced clerics in a number of administrative church positions.

— Throughout the church, there was a renewed attention to Scriptures, in liturgy and in individual spirituality.

— Eastern Catholic churches were encouraged to return to their own traditions, ending a period of Latinization and opening a new appreciation of variety within the universal church.

— Ecumenism flourished, in formal dialogue between Catholic officials and other Christian churches, and in prayer and fellowship encounters at the local level.

— After the council acknowledged the possibility of salvation for non-Christians, dialogue also began with other religions.

— Religious life changed dramatically, as religious orders adopted Vatican norms and rewrote their own constitutions, taking a new look at issues of authority, community and identity.

— The council restored the permanent diaconate as a ministry and allowed married men to be ordained deacons. Today, there are more than 29,000 permanent deacons around the world.

— The council's teaching that the pope and bishops together form a single collegial body led to a new appreciation for bishops and bishops' conferences. The Synod of Bishops was formed to meet regularly and advise the pope.

— Theology was revitalized, especially moral theology, which focused increasingly on biblical sources and the individual conscience, and less on church law or authority.

— The council underlined the church's solidarity with humanity instead of its separation from the secular world, and this led to a mushrooming of social and charitable activities. Church leaders spoke frequently about the church's identification with the poor and suffering, and the pope became a strong human rights advocate.

At the same time, the church experienced some worrisome developments, including a dramatic drop in vocations and an increase in the number of priests and religious seeking laicization. Mass attendance fell in many places, many Catholics abandoned the sacrament of penance, and dissent on certain teachings, such as birth control, was widespread.

All that has helped fuel a 40-year debate over the proper reading and realization of the council.

Pope Benedict has been a sometimes critical voice in this debate. But he always distinguished between the council and its implementation, saying that what hurt the church in the decade following Vatican II was "not the council but the refusal to accept it."

Professor assesses Tolkien's 'Catholic vision' in 'Rings' trilogy

BY GENE STOWE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NOTRE DAME, Ind. — J.R.R. Tolkien's "The Lord of the Rings" trilogy offers a Catholic approach to — and prescription for — modern society's ills, a Baylor University professor told a crowd at the University of Notre Dame Oct. 25.

"Tolkien has been a writer of such immense popularity in our time because he gave us such a deepened Catholic vision and understanding of the world," said Ralph Wood, a professor of theology and literature at the Baptist university in Waco, Texas.

Wood gave the first lecture in the Notre Dame Center for Ethics and Culture's fourth annual Catholic culture series. Three other talks were scheduled for November on the series theme, "Valor, Fellowship and Sacrifice: Tolkien's Catholic Myth."

Tolkien's view is Catholic in both the general sense of "universal" — an unpopular idea in a world of identity politics and fragmented diversity — and in the Catholic sense of a deeply sacramental understanding of reality, Wood said.

Tolkien, whose mother suffered the rejection of her relatives when she became a Catholic in 1900, was intensely devoted to Catholic teaching and piety, but unlike his friend C.S. Lewis he focused on literature as art and not as a vehicle for evangelism, Wood said.

Tolkien described "The Lord of the Rings" as "a fundamentally religious and Catholic work; unconsciously at first, but consciously in the revision," Wood said.

He said some features, such as Boromir's confession to Aragorn, the Marian qualities of Galadriel, the awakening of the dead to purge their past sins and the description of elvish "waybread" that resembles Communion bread — "it does not satisfy the stomach but fortifies the will," seem explicitly Catholic.

But in a larger way, he said, Tolkien presents modern ideas hostile to the Catholic view as being on the side of evil, illustrated by the powers of the ring:

— Deathlessness leads to a stretched-out life that loses quality for the ring's holders, in contrast to the understanding that a good death is the crown of one's life.

Gollum, for example, has lived 500 years because of the ring: "It's made him live longer but not better," Wood said.

— Magical disappearance has to do with instant gratification in contrast to the understanding that worthwhile accomplishment comes from slow and embodied work in the real world.

"To disappear is to be invisible," Wood said. "Look what the Internet does to us. It allows us to be completely anonymous," feeling free to do things we would not ordinarily do.

— Coercion denies the understanding of human freedom that leaves relationships a matter of choice rather than enslavement.

"For Tolkien, coercion is the fundamental fact of the modern world," he said, listing drug addiction as well as totalitarian governments under the heading. "Every time we yield our will to that which is coercive, the window of freedom narrows," he said.

Tolkien's solution to those situations is Christian faith, hope and charity — faith that involves the trust of the fellowship of the ring, hope that makes a person willing to play a part in a larger story without seeing the end, and charity that offers mercy and pity to someone as undeserving as Gollum, Wood said.

Gollum plays a crucial role, he added. The phrase "the pity of Bilbo may rule the fate of many" appears in each book, Wood said. "Had Gollum been killed, the quest would have failed."

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Every time I visit my friend Venel in Lascabobas, Haiti, I discover another of his community or parish responsibilities. So far I know these: music minister, pastoral care minister, owner of a copy business, husband and father, music teacher, store owner, youth minister.

When I read this weekend's Scriptures, I understood how all these roles have fallen to this one gifted man — a man who found a wife he has loved and cared for as a prized pearl (first reading); who says, "I love playing the music for my God" (Gospel); who every day looks for enterprising ways to provide for the poorest of people in a poor country and who patiently offers Third-World adolescents formation in faith.

On a Sunday morning soon after we'd met, Venel introduced me to his wife and young daughters. As they turned to go, he grinned proudly: "Do you think my wife is good? She is beautiful, yes?"

Later he told me the story of how as a young man he built his house next to a family with several children. The eldest was a 16-year-old girl whom he liked very much. Over the years he helped teach her to read and write, and assisted her with family chores while guiding her in the process of growing up.

As she matured, his love for her deepened. When she reached an appropriate age, he asked to marry her, an "unfailing prize" to whom he had entrusted his heart.

Venel also loves music. He plays a number of instruments well. Occasionally after liturgy in Lascabobas, I would ask a guitarist, trumpeter or keyboardist how he learned to play. Invariably the answer was "Venel." He has built up a sizable group of musicians who lift worship by their delight in playing for God.

Venel's wife is the wife of Proverbs, sharing the task of caring for the children, household and small family store with her beloved husband. The joyous music pervading the community and church is the return on Venel's investing his gift of musicianship in many young people.

No wonder God has given him more responsibilities. As the master saw in the good and faithful servant of the Gospel parable, God sees in Venel one who recognizes the holiness — and the potential for God's purposes — of what he has been given. As he invests and tends these gifts, and every additional one he is given, he shares his Master's joy.

Questions:

What specific gift have you received and invested for God's purposes? What return have you seen on that investment?

Sky falling for 'Chicken Little'

'Chicken Little' is a disappointing computer-animated film about a little chick who, after humiliating himself by sounding the alarm that the sky is falling, gets a chance to save face when his apocalyptic announcement later proves true. The movie's flat story lack charm or wit, undercutting warm themes of family bonds and believing in oneself. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-I — general patronage. TV EYE

If cable must carry broadcast stations, what must the stations carry?

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — One adage holds that you can have too much of a good thing. And, if this is true, you can definitely have too much of a bad thing.

This is just one angle to the ongoing debate in Congress about "multicast must-carry," the obligation of cable television systems to carry broadcast TV signals emanating within 35 miles of the borders of the cable service area.

Under this rule, cable systems must carry the signals of commercial network affiliates and public television stations. Part of why they do it is because viewers would put up a big stink if they didn't.

There have been brief feuds in some cities when a local network affiliate was off the cable system thanks to a game of financial "chicken" between the cable company and the owner of the local station.

There are fewer truly independent stations without a network affiliation, but they must also be carried if their antennae are within 35 miles of a cable franchise's service area. So, too, must low-power TV stations, some of which carry evangelical Christian programming around the clock.

If they're less than 35 miles from town, cable systems are likewise required to carry them.

Now comes the digital revolution. TV signals have been broadcast in an analog format since TV's beginning. The Federal Communications Commission has been pushing broadcasters to convert to a digital signal. Some have; most haven't.

It's the chicken-and-egg question all over again. Viewers won't watch digital TV unless they have a TV set that can pick up the signal; broadcasters don't want to invest the money to convert to digital until they know they'll have an audience.

Congress is considering a bill to force local stations to convert to digital by 2009. Some predict it will be the next big kick-start to the economy, especially considering our media-drenched society.

Broadcasters may have one incentive to make the switch: the possibility of splitting the digital signal into as many as six channels with no apparent reduction in quality — well, at least, visual quality.

Should cable systems be required to carry each one of a broadcaster's six channels? If you take ABC, CBS, Fox, NBC, UPN, the WB and PBS, most major metropolitan areas would have 42 channels sewn up on their area cable systems.

Cable companies complain that being required to carry all those signals would be unfair and that their channel capacity is already spoken for. Of course, they've been offering "digital cable" and other premium services at premium rates.

Some evangelical groups tout the multicast must-carry rule for two reasons: Their own stations would have six channel spaces on a cable system, and forcing cable to carry more regulate-able over-the-air programming could limit the space for unregulated cable channels whose content they find morally objectionable.

The U.S. bishops have a more modest goal — requiring over-the-air stations to carry more public service programming.

Bishop Gerald F. Kicanas of Tucson, Ariz., in a letter to the Senate Communications Committee chairman, Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, cited "a significant number" of anecdotes from dioceses finding it increasingly difficult to place their programming on local stations.

In the end, if broadcasters want to force cable to carry their content, the public should be able to force broadcasters to carry some of its content. The airwaves, after all, still belong to the public.

And if the moral and aesthetic arguments aren't enough to sway you, consider that the various versions of the bill call for $830 million-$990 million — enough money for each noncable TV household to get a pair of $40 coupons for a converter box to receive the new digital signals. That's a fraction of the expected cost.

Meanwhile, the government will be collecting about $10 billion when it auctions parts of the present TV spectrum that will be unneeded following digital conversion.

BMHS student honored for fundraising efforts

Teenager dedicated to fighting multiple sclerosis

KERNERSVILLE — Krissy Dull, a sophomore at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville, was honored by the Multiple Sclerosis Society for her continued fundraising efforts.

But when the MS Society offered her a trip to Australia to the MS Tour to Tanglewood, a bike ride that raises funds for the MS Society, the 15-year-old declined the award and donated the trip's value to the society's 2010 research campaign.

The benevolent gesture by the Greensboro teenager was one of many contributions she has made to the organization in the seven years she has been involved.

Krissy started raising funds for the MS Society at age 8 when she rode her Barbie Bike with her dad in the Central North Carolina bike tour. She founded her own bike tour team, the Canterbury Team, comprised of students and parents, and raised $50,000 in 2003 — Krissy herself contributing $10,000 to the total through her aggressive personal campaign that included the sale of glass beads and hotdogs.

Krissy and her team dedicated their efforts in honor of a classmate whose mother has MS.

In 2004, to recognize Dull's efforts, the National MS Society named her its first Outstanding Youth Award winner. The award recognized her contribution of more than $53,000 to the organization over the past several years by leading teams in the tour, holding craft sales, leading letter writing campaigns and conducting afternoon kids' camps.

"The main thing is [raising] more money," said Krissy. "The more people we can recruit, the more money we can raise. I get good support from my dad and mom ... church and school."

Krissy plans to intern with the MS Society after she graduates from high school.

"It makes me sad to see people suffer," she said. "I've seen the advances we've made and it makes me happy to see us raise money and get closer to a cure."

"Krissy's efforts in the fight against MS continue to inspire and move everyone she touches," said Joyce Nelson, president and CEO of the National Multiple Sclerosis Society.

"Krissy not only demonstrates a deep passion to help others, but her unselfish attitude and entrepreneurial approach make her one of the society's most valuable and admired volunteers," said Nelson. "Her generosity of spirit would be remarkable in an adult; it is unprecedented in a young woman of her age."

Principal Gelo welcomed with Jell-O

GREENSBORO — Gary Gelo, the new principal at Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro, was recently given a "cool" welcome by parents and students at the school's first Parent Teacher Organization meeting Sept. 20.

Gelo (pronounced "jello") and others in attendance were greeted with chilled trays of Jell-O gelatin dessert.

During the meeting, PTO officers discussed plans for the school year, and Gelo shared with parents a PowerPoint presentation highlighting the faculty's work to prepare for the SACS accreditation visit scheduled this month.

Gelo has worked the last several years as a consultant with Catholic schools across the country. Previously he was superintendent of Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charleston, S.C. and the Diocese of Shreveport, La.

He also served as principal of Blessed Sacrament School in Burlington, N.C. During his tenure at the school, it was the first Catholic school in North Carolina to be awarded the National School of Excellence Blue Ribbon Award from the U.S. Department of Education.

Gelo was also the founding principal of All Saints School in Charlotte.

notify their husbands before having an abortion. That opinion came as a minority dissent in Planned Parenthood vs. Casey, a landmark case contesting Pennsylvania's 1989 Abortion Control Act.

The Supreme Court in 1992 upheld most of the Pennsylvania law but agreed with the appeals court majority in striking down the spousal notification provision. In the Supreme Court's ruling the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist quoted Alito in his dissent against striking down the spousal notification portion of the law.

On the other hand, in 2000 Alito joined in a ruling striking down a New Jersey partial-birth abortion law as unconstitutional. In his concurring opinion he said Supreme Court precedents required a health exception for the mother to make the law constitutional.

In a case of church-state interest, Alito wrote the majority opinion of the appellate court in ACLU vs. Schundler, upholding a New Jersey city's holiday display that included a Nativity scene and menorah, on the grounds that it also displayed secular symbols.

In another religion-related case, he ruled in 1999 that the Newark, N.J., police department could not bar Muslim police officers from wearing beards for religious reasons, since the city permitted other officers to wear beards for medical reasons.

If confirmed, Alito would be the 11th Catholic in U.S. history to sit on the Supreme Court and would become the fifth Catholic justice on the current court, forming for the first time a majority of Catholics on the nine-member court.

Other Catholics currently on the nation's highest bench are recently appointed Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas.

Past Catholics on the Supreme Court included two other chief justices, Roger Taney, 1836-64, and Edward White, a justice from 1894 to 1910 and chief justice, 1910-21. Other former Catholic justices were Joseph McKenna, Pierce Butler, Frank Murphy and William Brennan Jr.

Alito was named to take the place of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who last summer announced her plans to retire as soon as a successor is confirmed.

In his nomination speech Bush called Alito "one of the most accomplished and respected judges in America."

The nomination came just four days after White House counsel Harriet Miers, who had been nominated Oct. 3 to succeed O'Connor, withdrew her name under heavy fire from conservative groups who form the core of Bush's political support. They were concerned that she had no court track record to back administration claims that she would bring a conservative judicial philosophy to the bench.

Alito could face the opposite problem. Observers believe that if Democratic Senators judge him too conservative their shaky political agreement to avoid minority filibusters to block judicial appointments could break down.

The day before Alito's nomination Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, expressed fears of a filibuster by Democrats if they oppose a nominee's position on abortion. "The topic which dominates the discussion, as we all know, is a woman's right to choose," he said.

Alito was born April 1, 1950, in Trenton, N.J. His late father, Samuel Alito Sr., was an Italian immigrant. His mother, Rose, who turns 91 later this year, was a public school teacher.

After graduating from Princeton University, he attended Yale Law School, where he was editor of the Yale Law Journal and earned his law degree in 1976.

After a year clerking for U.S. 3rd Circuit Judge Leonard Garth, Alito spent four years as assistant U.S. attorney for the District of New Jersey. He went on to become assistant to the U.S. solicitor general in 1981, deputy assistant U.S. attorney general in 1985 and U.S. attorney for the District of New Jersey in 1987.

He was only 39 when he was appointed to the federal appeals court in 1990. Bush said that with 15 years on that court Alito "has more prior judicial experience than any Supreme Court nominee in more than 70 years."

Should celebrants receive Communion after everyone else?

Q. One priest in a parish we visit often prefers to give Communion to the people first, before he receives. After all the other congregation and ministers receive, he takes the body and blood of Christ himself.

His explanation, we are told, is that this procedure is proper since the host at a dinner always serves the guests first and himself or herself last. Something seems out of tune here. But maybe we're seeing a problem where there isn't any. (Iowa)

A. I too have sometimes witnessed this practice. In my judgment, and obviously in the judgment of the church through the ages, there are at least two serious concerns about it.

First, the "host" at the eucharistic sacrifice, the one who invites and welcomes and feeds us there, is not the priest celebrant but the same one who was host at the Last Supper, Jesus Christ himself. The eucharistic prayers, in fact the whole Liturgy of the Eucharist, often express this belief.

The banquet is his, accomplished by the power of his Spirit, just as the eternal banquet in the kingdom of God, which eucharistic Communion prefigures and anticipates, belongs to him.

In every consecration it is Jesus who says, "Take this and eat." It is he who forms those who are nourished by his body and blood into "an everlasting gift" to the heavenly Father (Eucharistic Prayer III). And it is his Spirit who gathers "all who share this one bread and one cup into the one body of Christ," making those who receive it "a living sacrifice of praise" (Eucharistic Prayer IV).

The liturgical tradition of the church bends over backward to be sure the fact is not missed. The origin, the focus and the climax of the Eucharist is the risen Lord himself.

Some odd things are said occasionally today about "whose" Mass it is we celebrate. The words we hear just before Communion help keep everyone's perspective on target: "Happy are those who are called to his supper."

Second, it is a distortion of Christian liturgical history to call the congregation "guests" at Mass. The ordained priest is designated the presider at Mass, acting in the name of and in the person of Christ.

The ancient understanding of the church, however, repeated several times in the present General Instruction of the Roman Missal, is that the celebration of Mass is "the action of Christ and the people of God arrayed hierarchically," each one carrying out the role which pertains to him or her in the people of God (especially Nos. 5-18).

The first Eucharistic Prayer, the so-called Roman Canon, the only one in use for some centuries before Vatican Council II, makes clear several times that while the priest is doing the speaking, he is acting and speaking for all. "All of us gathered here before you ... offer you this sacrifice of praise."

As the Catechism of the Catholic Church notes, all the faithful "carry out this command of the Lord by celebrating the memorial of his sacrifice. In so doing, we offer to the Father what he has given us" (No. 1357).

Those present at Mass, therefore, are not guests of the priest. They are there and participate in the sacrifice because it is their right as baptized members of the body of Christ.

The ancient, and present, procedures of the church regarding Communion are founded on this truth.

A free brochure on ecumenism, including questions on intercommunion and other ways of sharing worship, is available by sending a stamped, self-addressed envelope to Father John Dietzen, Box 5515, Peoria, IL 61612.

Knowing what this darkness is all about

Often goodness comes from our response to evil

It is early Sunday morning, and a misty fog softens the silhouettes of trees newly freed of their summer leaves.

Winter's encroaching darkness moves steadily toward us in Anchorage. By December we will have only a little more than five hours of light; the rest will be blackness or the half-life of dusk.

Out the window from my desk I see a lamp shining through a bedroom window. My neighbor, who has two young children, battles multiple sclerosis. They have made accommodations to the car and the house, but I don't know how much longer she will be able to handle those stairs.

Her lamp shade is askew, tilted at an odd angle, as if to proclaim to the passerby the struggle being waged within those walls.

My son's friend has been staying with us over the weekend. His mother and father are away so that the mother may receive treatment for aggressive cancer. The friend and his sister — both high school seniors — stay at home during the week, checked on by relatives.

But on weekends, when, as his mother said, "the temptations are there," they stay with friends, and I have the pleasure of being the mom who gets to enforce curfew, reminding not one but two 17-year-old boys to call home and keep me posted on their evening whereabouts.

This friend is delightful — polite, upbeat, articulate. At dinner at a Chinese restaurant, the conversation turns toward college plans, and he tells us he looks forward next year to telling his parents about his college adventure since neither of them went to college. His sweet, youthful dreams juxtaposed against his mother's struggle make my throat tighten.

For the Journey

EFFIE CALDAROLA
CNS COLUMNIST

Once again this fall, I have begun an online retreat offered by Creighton University. Based on the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius Loyola, the retreat offers busy people a chance to share in the tremendous wealth of Ignatian spirituality.

Creighton's retreat starts in the fall and follows the church's liturgical year. This is perfect for me; as flowers die and darkness beckons, I find great inner longing for reflection. I want meaning, I want to know what this darkness is all about.

This week, the retreat asked us to reflect on the world's evil. Evil wasn't hard to notice. Although I am, personally, in the midst of a busy, happy time, all around me I see the falling away, the sickness, loneliness and sin that stalk us all on this journey.

The retreat's main message this week, however, wasn't about evil, but about God's response to it. We were to keep our eyes and hearts focused, in the background of our days, on the cross and the One who accepted it lovingly for us.

It reminds me, a farm girl at heart, that the grain of wheat which must fall to the ground to bear much fruit is most likely winter wheat, and to germinate it needs the cold, dark days of bleak mid-winter.

Letter to the Editor

Temple Beth El thanks its 'faithful friend'

Editor's note: The writer leads Temple Beth El in Charlotte.

Ben Sira teaches that the one who has found a faithful friend has found a treasure. Temple Beth El has found that faithful friend in Msgr. John McSweeney and members of St. Matthew Church.

For a fifth year, the church opened its doors this October to our congregation, Temple Beth El, so we could celebrate our Rosh Hashana morning service as an entire community. That's because we have grown too large for our own sanctuary.

As we welcomed the New Year of 5766 ... we began a 10-day period of reflection — of taking stock of who we are, of the ways we need to grow and of the blessings that we have. Our strong interfaith relationship with St. Matthew Church, as symbolized by its incredible generosity, was one such blessing for which we thanked God.

Remembering the dead helps Christians reflect on own lives, says pope

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Remembering those who have died, Christians naturally reflect on their own lives and on how to ensure that they will enjoy happiness forever with God, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Addressing some 20,000 pilgrims and visitors at his weekly general audience Nov. 2, the feast of All Souls, the pope said the secret to eternal happiness is to love God, follow his commandments and give to the poor.

The pope's audience talk focused on Psalm 112 and its proclamation, "Happy the man who fears the Lord."

After reading his prepared text, the pope offered a spontaneous summary of his remarks: "On the day we commemorate all souls, we face the reality of death and, therefore, the question of how to live well.

"This psalm tells us the answer is: Happy the man who gives, the man who does not live life for himself, but the man who is merciful, good and just, who lives with love for God and his neighbors," the pope said.

"In this way, we will live well, and we do not have to fear death, because we have the happiness of those who fear God, a happiness that will last forever," he said.

In his prepared text, the pope said,

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

"those who model their earthly existence in accordance with the indications of the word of God will have the fullness of life."

Trusting in God, he said, gives hope and harmony to one's life, and observing the moral law "is a source of a profoundly peaceful conscience."

Citing the prophet Job, Pope Benedict said it is obvious that being just and upright does not guarantee one will not suffer in this life, but it does guarantee eternal happiness.

The fact is proven, he said, by the "many just people around the world who suffer greatly."

Yet fidelity to God's word is a sign and guarantee that a believer's trust will be rewarded, he said.

"The heart of this fidelity to the divine word consists in a fundamental choice of charity toward the poor and needy," the pope said. "The just one, responding to the constant call of the prophets, takes the side of the emarginated and aids them with abundant help."

Addressing Polish pilgrims, the pope said that on the day when Catholics remember their dear ones who have died, "we also remember John Paul II. On the anniversary of his priestly ordination (Nov. 1, 1946) and his saint's day (the Nov. 4 feast of St. Charles Borromeo), we give thanks to God for the fruits of his life and for the ministry of this servant of God."

Pope Benedict ended his audience by urging the Italian government to adopt policies and tax laws to help families.

His remarks came in a greeting to the Italian Association of Large Families, a group formed by couples with at least five children. They are seeking a break in property taxes for large families and lobbying for a change to the system for determining garbage taxes — currently based on the size of the house or apartment and on the number of people living there.

The pope said the presence of 2,500 members of the association was an occasion to reaffirm the central role of the family in society, particularly for welcoming and serving human life.

"In today's social context, family groups with numerous children are a witness of faith, courage and optimism, because without children there is no future," he said.

Pope Benedict called for "adequate social and legislative interventions to safeguard and sustain the most numerous families, which are a richness and hope for the entire country."

Stewardship: A disciple's response

Many contribute in a variety of ways

The heart of the U.S. bishops' pastoral letter, "Stewardship: A Disciple's Response," reminds us that becoming a disciple of Jesus Christ calls for a response — to become good stewards of God's gifts.

If we truly recognize that everything we are, everything we will ever become, and everything we have is a gift from God, then we also recognize the need to cultivate those gifts out of gratitude and use them in service to God and others.

God calls each of us to participate in the building up of the Kingdom; each of us has been gifted by God with personal charisms needed to do whatever He asks of us. Every one of us has been called to a particular vocation in life — a unique way of following in the footsteps of Jesus.

Religious or lay, married or single — as Christians we are expected to be good stewards of our unique gifts. We cannot discern our vocations in isolation. It takes the support, help and encouragement of the community.

As a Christian community, on Nov. 13 we will celebrate our 17th annual Stewardship Awareness Sunday. It is an appropriate time to remember how God has gifted our parishes and missions here in the Diocese of Charlotte through the time, talent and treasure of thousands of people.

Some are serving through ordained ministry as priests and deacons. Others have answered the call to religious life as sisters and brothers. Still others are lay ministers serving their fellow parishioners as catechists, youth ministers, lectors, extraordinary ministers of holy Communion, ministers of welcome and hospitality, commission members, pastoral and finance council members, and in a variety of other parish ministries.

Our parishes are filled with people who devote a portion of their time to daily prayer for the needs of others, who contribute generously to support their parish and diocese. As I reflect on the Parable of the Talents on this Stewardship Awareness Sunday, I am grateful for the many good stewards of our diocese who have accepted their gifts gratefully from God, nurtured those gifts, and returned them to God with increase through service to the community.

I invite each of you to set aside some time to prayerfully consider their response to the questions "What does it mean to be a disciple of Jesus Christ?" and "What am I called to do in response to that discipleship?"

Msgr. West is vicar general and chancellor for the Diocese of Charlotte.

Responding to challenges

The creation of a wise generation through the energy crisis

I spoke with a religious sister recently whose institution utilizes windmills to generate energy — much like the windmills I saw atop a Pennsylvania mountain recently when I traveled through by train.

Speaking with this nun, I came to realize that we don't really need to fear an energy crisis in the future. We could be in for an enormously exciting time in this regard.

I learned from her that the one windmill the sisters possess not only meets their energy demands, but often surpasses them. The excess energy is sold to the nearby electric plant, providing the sisters additional income.

This is but one of many hopeful energy signs of the times. During Solar Decathlon 2005 on the National Mall in Washington, D.C., I witnessed many others. The Solar Decathlon brings together university students who present their designs of energy-efficient, solar-powered homes in a competition.

Naturally, I learned at this exposition that it is much cheaper to save energy than to make it. Good insulation is key to making this happen.

In the race to conserve energy, researchers have discovered that structural insulated panels are one of the best means for saving energy. These prefabricated panels typically are made of foam insulation sandwiched between sheets of oriented strand board or other building materials.

Compact fluorescent lamps are another energy saver. These energy-efficient lamps use less electricity, and their reduced electricity consumption (less wasted heat) also means that cooling loads are decreased during the summer months, thus reducing the electricity consumed by air conditioners.

Yet another energy saver is the low-emissivity window. Low-emissivity coatings for windows, invented in the 1980s, have revolutionized window technology.

Thin, transparent coatings of silver or tin oxide permit visible light to pass through, but also reflect infrared heat radiation back into the room. This reduces heat loss through the windows in winter.

The technology doesn't stop here. On the mall during the Solar Decathlon were a number of homes run entirely on solar energy. The heat generated by solar energy warms water, which then can be transferred to space-heating systems.

Ingenious ways of dealing with energy are more numerous than the stars.

The Human Side

Today, enormous amounts of money is being poured into energy research.

Francis Bacon once said that a prudent question is half of wisdom. Today, students and their professors, working feverishly in laboratories, are raising one question after another about how new ways of saving and generating cost-effective energy.

At times I wonder what will become of our young generation. No doubt there is much to worry about, given all that influences and/or challenges them in contemporary society.

But what I saw in Washington were young people whose imaginations were being stretched to the limit and who were responding to challenges in ways that suggest the birth of a wise generation.

St. Joseph Church serves growing, diverse Catholic community

ASHEBORO — The Catholic community of Asheboro attained parish status in 1948, although early traces of a Catholic presence date back more than a half-century earlier.

During the 1880s, two sergeants of the British Army and a female native of Ireland composed the first Catholic community in the Asheboro area. The servicemen, having completed their time of duty, settled in the area in search of gold-mining fortunes. The Irishwoman became a key figure in the establishment of a chapel.

For several years, visiting priests from neighboring communities celebrated Masses in the chapel, a former law office, in town. When the servicemen died and Mrs. Bartow, the third Catholic, moved away, the Catholic community in Asheboro ended for the next several decades.

Between the World War I years and the 1930s, local reports of itinerant priests visiting Asheboro by train suggest a Catholic citizenry, however scant, in the area. A railway car converted into a chapel carried the priests, who were said to have spent a week at a time ministering to Catholics and discussing the faith with others.

Beginning in April 1935, priests for High Point — among them Father Michael J. Begley, who would become the founding bishop of the Diocese of Charlotte — celebrated weekday Masses in Asheboro homes. Residents traveled to High Point or Greensboro for Sunday liturgies.

When gasoline rationing during World War II years began affecting travel opportunities, Asheboro Catholics gathered for Mass in the courtroom of the City Building.

In September 1947, the present church site was purchased. A chapel was set up in a house on the property, and Father Edward Sullivan, pastor of Holy Rosary Church (now Our Lady of the Rosary Church) in Lexington, served the Asheboro community. The congregation thereby became a mission of the Lexington church.

Father Sullivan celebrated the first Mass in the chapel on Christmas Eve in 1947. In March of the following year, the parish was established and Father

St. Joseph Church in Asheboro, a red brick church originally dedicated in September 1948, has seen many expansions and improvements to accommodate its growing parish.

Sullivan was appointed pastor. Bishop Joseph S. Waters of Raleigh dedicated the church under the patronage of St. Joseph in September 1948.

Masses continued to be celebrated in the chapel until 1954, when a red brick church was constructed next to the original structure. More improvements and expansions came in 1978 when a rectory was built and a second floor was added to the church. The parish was in the care of the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales at the time.

During the early 1980s, St. Joseph Church ministered to about 22 Catholic families in Liberty, to the northeast. That number increased with time, and the mission community was assimilated into the parish.

In the early 1990s, a new addition was added to the church that connected it to the rectory and, in response to the growing presence of a Spanish-speaking community, an outreach was begun and a Mass was offered in Spanish. Because of the continued expansion of the Spanish community, a second Mass was offered in Spanish and child, youth and adult educational programs also were conducted in Spanish.

Father Joseph Mack has served St. Joseph Church since 1993, ministering to almost 750 registered parishioners and to some 300 Hispanic Catholics in the area as well. The parish has an active Knights of Columbus council, Ladies Guild and Right to Life program.

"With this continued growth in terms of members, we face the positive challenge of continuing to grow as a community of faith called to bring the light of the Gospel where we are planted," said Father Mack.

CHARLOTTE — They came together from various walks of life, on different spiritual journeys, each hoping to come away with similar results.

It was difficult to be disappointed.

Fifty pilgrims from around the Diocese of Charlotte joined Bishop Peter J. Jugis on a 10-day pilgrimage to Italy Oct. 17-27.

From a basilica in the mountaintop town of Assisi to a papal audience at the Vatican, the pilgrims visited sites of eucharistic miracles, toured the homes of saints and experienced God's presence in places and ways many had never before imagined.

"The Lord is saying something to each one of us on this pilgrimage," said Bishop Jugis

WASHINGTON — In a House hearing room recently, much of the discussion focused on the meanings of the words "feels" and "pain."

Is pain "a subjective sensory and emotional experience that requires the presence of consciousness," as a recent article in the Journal of American Medical Association defined it?

Or does pain instead depend on certain physiological and behavioral responses to stimuli? Or does it have to do primarily with brain development?

Answers to those questions could make all the difference to women considering an abortion — and to their unborn children — if a measure pending in the

IRON NUN

Sister Madonna Buder, a member of the Sisters for Christian Community who lives in Spokane, Wash., became the first 75-year-old woman to finish an Ironman distance race Aug. 28 in Penticton, British Columbia.

Nun sets another Ironman world record by completing Hawaiian course

KONA, Hawaii (CNS) — A 75-year-old nun who has made history for her participation in Ironman competitions around the world set another record in October at the Ford Ironman World Championships in Kona.

Sister Madonna Buder, a Sister of Christian Community from Spokane, Wash., set a world record as the first female athlete over age 75 to complete the event.

Her time at the finish line was 15 hours, 54 minutes and 16 seconds for the competition comprised of a 2.4-mile swim, 112-mile bike ride and 26.2-mile run.

"By the grace of God, we just squeaked through," Sister Madonna said after the race.

Fellow American Robert McKeague became the first 80-year-old to finish, with a time of approximately 16 hours. More than 2,000 athletes from around the world, including more than 600 from the U.S., competed.

Since she began competing as a triathlete in 1982, Sister Madonna has completed more than 300 races, undaunted by broken bones and bike crashes.

Earlier this year she won the Ironman Canada in Penticton, British Columbia, for the 75-and-over age group. Her time was 16:46:30.

Sister Madonna's cheery disposition, unbounded determination and quick wit carry her through the tough circumstances that are typical of each Ironman competition. Cheers of "you go, girl" and "way to go, Sister" spur her along at each race.

Sound nutrition, wise training practices and mental preparedness all are the hallmarks of champion endurance athletes such as Sister Madonna.

Fellow Ironman world champion Mark Allen won the title six times and knows the role mental attitude plays on the Kona race course.

"Very few athletes are willing to incorporate a spiritual element and focus on their racing," he said. "But without that, how can you possibly deal with your humanness in the middle of all that Ironman asks you to do? That for sure is one of Sister Madonna's strengths."

From Allen's perspective, "getting rid of self-doubt, overcoming fear and learning to be quiet in the midst of the chaos called race day" are all keys to a positive outcome.

Support urged for anti-torture provision in appropriations bill

WASHINGTON (CNS) — U.S. law and policy about torture of prisoners "is more about who we are than who they are," an adviser to the U.S. bishops told congressional staffers Nov. 2.

In urging support for an anti-torture amendment to the appropriations bill for the Defense Department, Walt Grazer said reports of prisoner abuse by U.S. forces could seriously undermine the country's anti-terrorism efforts and compromise human dignity.

Grazer, an adviser on religious liberty and human rights for the U.S. bishops, said that through its various ministries the church witnesses both the anxieties and hopes of people who long for peace and security for their families, as well as the pain of those who have been tortured and mistreated under various regimes.

"Even great nations can risk their reputations and lose their soul through actions that violate fundamental moral principles," Grazer said.

The briefing was hosted by supporters of the amendment in the Senate version of the bill, which would prohibit the use of any interrogation practices other than those approved in the Army Field Manual on Intelligence Interrogation.

Grazer said respect for the human dignity of every person, whether ally or enemy, "must serve as the foundation of the pursuit of security, justice and peace. There can be no compromise ... to protect the basic human rights of any individual incarcerated for any reason."

The long U.S. history of leadership and support for human rights around the world also is at stake, he said.

The nation "must not and cannot embrace a dangerous morality that 'desperate times call for desperate measures' or 'the end justifies the means.'"

Grazer said "we can demonstrate that even in the face of terrorism we will not lose a respect for human life and our dignity, nor assail the dignity of others."

Vatican's U.N. rep says more effort needed for women, health, peace

NEW YORK (CNS) — While the recent U.N. summit on reaching the Millennium Development Goals' targets showed signs of progress, efforts concerning gender equality, health care and nuclear disarmament must be ratcheted up, said the Vatican's U.N. representative.

The summit's final document "is not wholly devoid of substance," said Archbishop Celestino Migliore, the representative. "There has been an important step toward halting extreme poverty, halting the spread of HIV/AIDS and providing universal education."

The archbishop said increased discussion of globalization also was a good sign, even though disagreement exists as to whether globalization has affected the world positively or negatively.

"The common opinion is that globalization is a phenomenon that should be made to serve the malady of human society today, namely inequality. There is inequality at all levels," he said.

The archbishop pointed to International Labor Organization statistics showing women represent 60 percent of the world's working poor. In order to lower this percentage, he said, more attention must be paid to education and women's access to and control over resources and capital.

Emphasizing the Catholic Church's commitment to women's education, the archbishop said that Catholic-sponsored microfinance programs aimed at empowering women operate in several countries.

He also pointed to the nearly 200,000 Catholic primary and secondary schools and 1,000 universities and institutes of higher learning worldwide.

Two major millennium goals, lowering child and maternal mortality rates and combating HIV/AIDS and other diseases, depend on more than an influx of cash, medicine and trained doctors and nurses, he said. Archbishop Migliore suggested that wealthy nations encourage health care workers from developing countries to remain in their homelands, where they can work to improve their own local systems.

International conference discusses infinity, limits of knowledge

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A dialogue between science and theology requires a careful definition of terms and respect for the limits of knowledge in each field, said participants in a Vatican-sponsored project.

Participants of the project, "Science, Technology and the Ontological Quest," held an international conference in Rome Nov. 9-11 bringing together scientists, mathematicians, philosophers and theologians to discuss infinity.

"Believers have an obligation to listen to what modern secular science has to offer, just as we ask that the wisdom of faith is taken into consideration as a voice of expertise on humanity," said Cardinal Paul Poupard, president of the Pontifical Council for Culture, which coordinates the project.

The two-year-old project provides education in science and technology at several of Rome's pontifical universities and sponsors public lectures and conferences by visiting scientists.

The cardinal said debate about the origin of the world is just one area where scientists and religious believers must clarify terms and recognize the limits of their own discipline.

People who support "creationism" as the only acceptable Christian explanation of the world's origins, he said, are "taking something never meant to be a scientific explanation and calling it science."

The creation story in the Book of Genesis, he said, was written "to explain that the world was created by God, not how it was created."

A theologian cannot pretend to use the Bible as irrefutable proof of the scientific process of the world's creation, just as scientists cannot use biology or physics as irrefutable proof that God was not involved in the process, he said.

Msgr. Gianfranco Basti, project director, said infinity was chosen as the conference's topic because "it is the only common argument of study in the mathematical, physical, human and theological sciences."

The conference, he said, looked at such questions as: "Is infinity in modern mathematics simply a formal tool without any referential value?" and "Are the infinity of human freedom and the infinity of God's freedom mutually exclusive, as some 20th-century philosophers claim?"

Greeting a prince

Prince Charles greets students outside Healy Hall at Georgetown University in Washington Nov. 3. The Prince of Wales attended a seminar on faith and social responsibility at the university during an official visit to the United States. Founded in 1789, the same year the U.S. Constitution took effect, Georgetown University is the nation's oldest Catholic and Jesuit university. Today, Georgetown is a major international research university.

would help do that," said Brendan Vickers, 13, Holy Crusaders' president and founder. "It's a good experience. It's quiet — you can really hear God and it gives you a lot of time to pray."

"Jesus spent time for us, so we can surely spend time for him, to talk and listen and to pray for our petitions," said Andrew Vickers, 12, Brendan's brother.

Spending time in eucharistic adoration, said Andrew, can help people "come closer to Jesus and understand his presence in the Sacrament."

"It's actually Jesus. You're there and he's there, present right in front of you," said Kevin Thorpe, 11, Holy Crusaders' treasurer. "If you pray to him, he can help you in many ways."

Brendan said he finds peace when he adores the Blessed Sacrament.

"It helps me see that Jesus really loves us. He gave his life for us," said Brendan.

The concept for the Holy Crusaders came to Brendan while learning about parliamentary procedures in English class. He was inspired last February to start his own organization, a "Catholic boys club" dedicated to bringing people to Jesus.

To join the club, boys have to have made their first Communion and must be willing to spend one hour a month in eucharistic adoration. The boys offer their holy hours for different intentions; so far, the Holy Crusaders have offered 28 hours for Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

"The group helps us learn about our faith; it's a fun way that we can do that and spend time with God and our friends," said Andrew.

"They (the boys) said they wanted to do two big eucharistic events this year," said Debbie Vickers, Brendan and Andrew's mother.

The first, she said, was participating in the eucharistic procession during the Diocese of Charlotte's first Eucharist Congress Sept. 23-24. The second was the 40-hour devotion at the parish. Father James Collins, pastor, offered his full support.

"They stood outside the Masses to recruit volunteers. They made flyers. They hung the curtains in the chapel," said Debbie Vickers. "And all the boys prayed a novena before starting for their success."

The boys' efforts paid off.

"We got enough people for every hour, but many people who didn't sign up have come by to adore," said Brendan.

"They worked very hard. We've been overwhelmed with the amount of people who signed up as well as the walk-ins," said Meg Barrett, whose son, Kevin, 10, is a Holy Crusader.

Approximately 120 people participated in the 40-hour devotion, said Barrett.

"It proves people want this," she said. "In this busy age, they still want an hour of solitude with Jesus."

"God wanted this. You can see his hand in everything," said Debbie Vickers. "It all just fell into place."

Barrett said the Holy Crusaders, all of whom are altar servers, take "their faith seriously, and their parents have instilled that in them."

But when they are not bringing people closer to God, they are just "typical boys," she said. "They're out there playing soccer and doing 'boy things.'"

When contemplating his future, Brendan said he would like to become a priest, and that he is inspired by many of the priests in the diocese.

"I see how happy they are (in their ministry) and it encourages me," he said.

Danny Aberle, 13, had never before participated in a 40-hour devotion.

"It's been really interesting," he said. "It's made me feel closer to God, and I would definitely do it again."

Brendan said the Holy Crusaders may organize another 40-hour devotion and they already have plans to participate in next year's diocesan Eucharistic Congress.

'Attitude of gratitude'

Parishioners find stewardship in all ministries

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

GREENSBORO — The parishioner told Pat Spivey that he was "doughnut minister" that day.

Spivey asked what he meant.

"I'm picking up the doughnuts," he said. "That's my ministry."

"That got me to thinking about [stewardship] more," Spivey, pastoral associate for administration, said. "I've been blessed with many things. I have three good kids, good young men. We need to give back."

Everything at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro is a ministry, from serving during liturgy to caring for the church grounds and gardens and working in the community.

"St. Pius X enjoys the reputation of being an active parish," Msgr. Anthony J. Marcaccio, pastor, said. "I think this translates as a parish with many ministries. These vibrant and diverse ministries are not our goal, but the result of our goal — communicating the saving message of Jesus Christ."

St. Pius X Church has about 1,200 registered households and more than 60 ministries. In addition to those connected with liturgy, ministries include various committees; the crop walk to raise money for food and other help for the poor; transporting residents of Fellowship Hall, a dependency treatment center, to and from Mass; supporting the church's sister parish in Manázo, Peru; and cooking and serving meals at Weaver House, a homeless shelter.

St. Pius X Church also participates four to five times a year with the Inter-faith Hospitality Ministry. Rotating with other Greensboro churches, St. Pius X Church opens rooms in its Kloster Center, the parish hall, to homeless families.

'It's all stewardship, no matter how you're giving back.'

While families stay at the center, parishioners prepare breakfast and dinner for them, tutor and play with the children, and provide transportation.

"It's all stewardship, no matter how you're giving back," said Patty Dunning, Stewardship Committee chair.

Several years ago, Spivey attended a conference led by Father William J. Bausch, author of several books.

"One of the things he said that most impressed me was that we who are in leadership in parishes are to be servant leaders," Spivey said. "It's easier to do it yourself, but it's important to get people involved. You don't have to be the chairman to be involved."

St. Pius X Church fosters parishioner involvement through such efforts as the annual ministry fair.

"We had a great response at our ministry fair this year," Dunning said. "Everybody wanted to get involved. (Among others who volunteered) the ministry of hospitality (ushers and greeters) signed up 20 new people."

"Msgr. (Marcaccio) is excellent with keeping stewardship in front of the parish," Spivey said.

"It is a blessing to pastor a community of faith so receptive to God's word," Msgr. Marcaccio said. "My promotion of stewardship is simply to share the Gospel and give concrete opportunities to live it."

Stewardship of time, talent and treasure is highlighted in the parish's monthly newsletter. The weekly bulletin has a "stewardship corner."

Children learn about stewardship early. They have their own envelopes, one set for 5- to 8-year-olds, another for middle schoolers. They can put in monetary donations, and the envelopes include a place for them to write how they have contributed time and talent.

It can be anything. One girl said she could make people laugh.

"The other aspect that I always want to improve on is thanking people for what they do and what God does through them," Msgr. Marcaccio said. "This 'attitude of gratitude' makes for powerful liturgies and, in a similar way, a truly Eucharistic (thankful) people makes for good stewardship."

Breaking the cycle of poverty

CCHD collection aids local, national programs

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Rent. Food. Bus fare. New shoes for a 12-year-old son.

For most people, these represent the basic necessities of life. But for nearly 37 million Americans, each item is a choice: "Do I buy shoes or bread?" "Do I pay all the rent, or ride the bus to work?"

Many Americans living in poverty work full time, with an average income of $8,858 a year. The U.S. Census Bureau defines poor families as those with incomes of less than $14,680 for a family of three.

The Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CCHD) is the domestic anti-poverty, social justice program of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops. Its mission is to address the root causes of poverty through the promotion and support of community-controlled, self-help organizations and education.

"CCHD was a program originally designed to alleviate poverty," said Terri Jarina, program director for parish social ministry for Office of Justice and Peace, Catholic Social Services, in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"Over time, the U.S. bishops realized poverty is a bigger problem than originally thought, and their focus shifted to breaking the cycle of poverty" she said.

CCHD supports local groups involved in creating jobs, improving neighborhoods, training adults for employment at a living wage, keeping schools safe and enriching for children, and raising leaders for the future.

This year's collection in the Diocese of Charlotte will be taken up during Masses the weekend of Nov. 19-20.

In 2004, the Diocese of Charlotte was the second-highest diocese in the nation for per-Catholic giving. Catholics in western North Carolina, on average, donated 86 cents each, for a total diocesan collection of $163,974.

Approximately 75 percent of the collection will be distributed to the national CCHD office, while the balance will remain in the Diocese of Charlotte for local grants.

According to Jarina, the diocesan Office of Justice and Peace examines social action in addition to acts of charity, to learn why poverty happens and determine how to overcome it.

"CCHD looks at how money awarded through grants can help keep people from sliding back into poverty," said Jarina.

WANT MORE INFO?

The 2005 CCHD collection will be taken at Masses Nov. 19-20. Please read Terri Jarina's column on page 14.

CCHD grant applications will be available Dec. 1, 2005 from the Office of Justice and Peace. Applications must be postmarked by Feb. 15, 2006. Call Terri Jarina at (704) 370-3234 for more information.

Vatican II's changes

Sunday of Advent, ushered in the first of a series of wide-ranging changes in the Mass. Instead of having his back to the people, the priest faced the people. And Mass was not just being "said," it was "celebrated" — and not all in Latin, but with parts of it in the vernacular.

It was just the first step toward the "full, conscious and active participation" by the laity in the church's liturgical life as mandated earlier that year by the Second Vatican Council's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy.

By 1970, the new Order of the Mass, which brought about further changes, was published.

There was not merely an "epistle" from the New Testament prior to the Gospel, but an Old Testament reading, as well as a responsorial psalm between Old and New Testament readings, with a three-year cycle of Sunday readings and a two-year cycle of weekday readings.

Receiving Communion

The fasting period before one was permitted to receive Communion, previously shortened in the 1950s from midnight to three hours (three for solid foods, one hour for liquids), was lessened further to one hour for all food intake.

Communicants no longer knelt down at a rail to take the host, but continued to stand. The U.S. bishops, with approval from the Vatican, permitted reception of the host in communicants' hands.

The 1969 General Instruction on the Roman Missal permitted Communion under "both species," meaning bread and wine. The bishops, again with Vatican approval, had allowed this in U.S. parishes under limited circumstances as early as 1965.

More Massgoers receive Communion now. There is a debate over whether that is the result of the relaxed fasting rule, Catholics feeling they have a right to the Eucharist, or a lessened sense of sin that leads some people to receive Communion when they should not.

With no Latin liturgies, there also was no longer a distinction between "high Mass" and "low Mass."

Music and laity

Choirs started coming down from the choir loft in the rear of the church and sang alongside or in the sanctuary in full view of the assembly. The music changed, too.

In keeping with the tenor of the times, the "folk Mass" sprang up primarily with guitar-driven ensembles. Following on its heels were gospel Masses for black Catholics, polka Masses for Polish-American Catholics, and others singing in the mother tongue of their ethnic group.

A torrent of new music written and published since Vatican II resulted in a flood of "worship resources" in the pews, including missal aids and/or hymnals printed on newsprint, plus hymn books for various musical genres.

The sign of peace was inserted into the Mass between the Our Father and the Lamb of God. Once only exchanged between a bishop and his deacon, the custom was spread to the whole assembly.

With liturgical changes came many more roles for lay people. Beyond the surge in the number of choirs, the laity could be lectors — a role previously reserved for priesthood candidates — as well as liturgists and eucharistic ministers, today called extraordinary ministers of holy Communion.

Even ushers, who had passed around the offertory baskets and monitored the Communion lines for generations, were now being counted upon to be ministers of hospitality, giving a warm welcome to newcomers and longtime parishioners alike.

Changes and practices

The Saturday Mass itself was another innovation. The 1967 Vatican document "Eucharisticum Mysterium" (Instruction on the Worship of the Eucharistic Mystery) declared that, in cases of "pastoral necessity," Sunday Masses could be celebrated on Saturday evenings.

The thinking was that those who could not fulfill their obligations on Sunday could attend on Saturday. Over time, the demographics of those attending Saturday Mass has changed, and the congregation is often older than that for Sunday Masses.

The "paraliturgy," a kind of prayer service, and the "holy hour," another devotional practice that sometimes included eucharistic devotion, took their places along side other practices such as rosary recitations, novenas and the Forty Hours devotion.

"In any place in the history of the church where we've emphasized participation, it has sometimes come at the cost of contemplation," said Msgr. James P. Moroney, executive director of the bishops' Secretariat for Liturgy.

Another significant development was the communal penance service, often drawing hundreds into churches for Scripture readings, a homily, examination of conscience and prayers, followed by an opportunity for individual confession and absolution.

Source and summit

Forty years after the close of Vatican II, some of the most passionate debates among Catholics, from the laity to cardinals, still revolve around liturgical issues.

Vatican II proclaimed the Eucharist as "the source and the summit of Christian life," Msgr. Moroney said, so "it is absolutely right (that) the place for disputations and victories to be clear is at the source and at the summit."

The Eucharist, he added, is "the source of everything and the summit of everything, and it's going to be a place where everything we embrace and everything we disdain stands in crystal clarity."

PILGRIMAGE TO ITALY

Bishop Peter J. Jugis explains during Mass the eucharistic miracle of 1263 that transpired inside the Cathedral of Orvieto, Italy. The cathedral visit was part of a 10-day pilgrimage to Italy Oct. 17-27.

Pilgrims venture to Italy's holy places

during his homily in a eucharistic adoration chapel at the Cathedral of Orvieto, where he celebrated the first daily Mass of the pilgrimage.

"We as a group should hope to return from this pilgrimage renewed, to better serve Jesus," said the bishop.

The Orvieto cathedral houses the bloodstained corporal (altar cloth) of the eucharistic miracle in 1263, when a priest who doubted his faith held a Eucharist that dripped blood during Mass. It was in response to this miracle that the feast of Corpus Christi was instituted by Pope Urban IV in 1264.

"It is appropriate to begin Mass here where this eucharistic miracle took place, especially during the Year of the Eucharist," said Bishop Jugis.

Many pilgrims were awestruck at the massive cathedral with its façade that took more than 300 years to complete.

"It was gorgeous," said Deacon Carlos Medina, permanent deacon at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, who assisted with the Mass. "I did not want the Mass to end."

The pilgrims also visited Lanciano, the home of another eucharistic miracle.

In the eighth century, a Basilian monk who doubted the presence of Christ in the consecrated bread and wine, found both elements changed to flesh and blood during a Mass. Scientific tests done in the latter half of the 20th century concluded that the flesh and blood are human in origin, the flesh consisting of muscular tissue of the heart.

The flesh and coagulated blood are now contained in the Lanciano's Sanctuary of the Eucharistic Miracle.

"I couldn't stop crying. The holy presence there touched my heart in the deepest way," said Soraya Narine, a parishioner of St. Therese Church in Mooresville. "I was set free."

"Seeing the eucharistic miracle brought home what the Eucharist really is," said Denise Glander, a parishioner of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Lenoir.

"When the eucharistic miracles happened, it was because there was a lack of faith in the people, and the Spirit stepped in to support their faith," said Margaret Simone, a parishioner of St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro.

"Here we are, hundreds of years later, coming for the same thing — to support our faith," she said.

"The Eucharist is a sign of Christ's love," said Bishop Jugis. "The eucharistic miracles are signs that invite us to a deeper faith in God's grace ... to eternal life."

Footsteps of saints

The pilgrims spent two days in Assisi, home to the Basilica of St. Francis where the saint's remains are buried. The basilica is adorned with hundreds of frescoes depicting events in St. Francis' life and the crucifix from which Christ spoke to him.

"St. Francis of Assisi always had his sights on his hope of eternal life. God was his treasure; everything else was worthless," said Bishop Jugis during Mass in the basilica.

"He drew his inspiration from the poverty of Jesus on the cross, who was stripped of everything," said the bishop.

In Assisi the pilgrims also visited the Basilica of St. Mary of the Angels, built in 1569 to protect the Portiuncula, the church given to St. Francis and his followers by Pope Innocent III. The basilica houses the rose bushes on which Francis threw himself, the cave in which he prayed, and a statue of St. Francis on which live white doves rest.

"There was something higher guiding the doves," said Narine. "I wish more people could realize that."

Also visited was the Basilica of St. Clare, which houses her incorrupt body in a crystal casket. St. Clare, who used the Eucharist to help save Assisi during an invasion by Saracens in 1240, was a follower of St. Francis who formed the Poor Clares, the Franciscan's order of nuns.

Pam Riley, a parishioner of St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville, found Assisi "phenomenal."

"It brings home the tremendous sacrifices they (Sts. Francis and Clare) made," she said. "They came from such wealthy families and gave up all of that for God."

The pilgrims ventured to Mount St. Angelo's Grotto of St. Michael the Archangel, a cave or "celestial basilica" in which apparitions of St. Michael occurred in the fourth century.

"The simplicity of the cave was particularly moving," said Lisa Balzano, a parishioner of Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro.

"I'm experiencing a rejuvenation of my faith; it's hard not to when we are walking in the footsteps of the saints," she said.

Next was San Giovanni Rotondo, former home of St. Pio, commonly known as Padre Pio, a Capuchin monk and stigmatist who was canonized by Pope John Paul II in June 2002.

"St. Pio is a sign of God's holiness, a reflection of the sanctity and goodness of God the Father," said Bishop Jugis, "and a sign of our call to be holy and participate in the divine nature of God."

Pilgrims visited Padre Pio's cell, confessional and tomb housed in the Church of Santa Maria delle Grazie. During the visit, Bishop Jugis blessed the pilgrims with one of the saint's gloves and a crucifix he kept under his pillow.

"One of the highlights was attending Mass where Padre Pio celebrated his first Mass," said Jan Guess, a parishioner of Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville, which is staffed by Capuchin friars.

Padre Pio often spent up to 10 hours a day hearing confessions.

"Confession was a big part of his ministry," said Bishop Jugis. "The sacraments of the Eucharist and penance go hand in hand for the purification of the soul."

Foundations of faith

In Loreto, the pilgrims visited the Holy House of Nazareth, the traditional home of Jesus, Mary and Joseph now housed in a basilica. According to the original legend, the house was where the annunciation of Mary and incarnation of Jesus took place; it was transported by angels from Nazareth to Croatia in 1291, only to be moved three years later to Loreto.

"Seeing the house of Mary (in Loreto) ... seeing where she lived and touching the walls ... it made my faith more real," said Glander.

"A house built on a firm foundation will not collapse," said Bishop Jugis.

Jesus, he said, is "our house, our home. People, by their baptism, become living stones in the living body of Christ, built upon the cornerstone of Jesus."

The pilgrims toured also St. Andrew's Cathedral in Amalfi. In Rome, they visited St. Paul Outside the Walls church; the catacombs of St. Calixtus; St. John Lateran Church, the cathedral church of the pope in which the altar holds the relics of Sts. Peter and Paul; and the Basilica of St. Mary Major, which houses relics of Jesus' manger from Bethlehem.

At the Vatican

In addition to touring the Vatican Museums, St. Peter's Basilica and the Sistine Chapel, the pilgrims attended Pope Benedict XVI's weekly general audience, at which they were publicly recognized by the pope.

"What impressed me the most was the people from all over the world, unified in faith," said Riley. "We all had one common reason to be there."

"The 50,000 people in attendance were a microcosm of the universality of the Catholic Church," said Bishop Jugis.

Pope Benedict's main audience focused on the hymn to Christ found in St. Paul's Letter to the Philippians. The pope said the canticle underlines the greatness of Christ's sacrifice and glory by contrasting his divinity with his willingness to become human and die on the cross.

"Jesus loves us," the pope said. "This word of tenderness is a great consolation and comfort for us, but it is also a great responsibility to be lived day by day."

Pope Benedict greeted each of the attending bishops after the audience, including Bishop Jugis.

"I thanked him for the (recent) Synod of Bishops. He said it would be a tremendous blessing for the church," said the bishop.

The synod concluded Oct. 22 by approving 50 final propositions and publishing a message to the world.

Journey's end

A highlight of the pilgrimage for Bishop Jugis was celebrating daily Mass in the various churches and holy places.

"So many of the pilgrims were traveling to Italy and experiencing these holy places for the first time," said Bishop Jugis. "I was delighted to be a part of that with them."

"I've seen some of these holy places before, but seeing the awe and excitement of the pilgrims helped me to rediscover these places again for myself," he said.

Many of the pilgrims said their experiences were overwhelmingly positive.

"There are not enough words to describe how special and holy this pilgrimage has been, and how it has strengthened my faith," said Guess.

"I needed a renewal of the spirit, and I've been replenished," said Narine. "I feel like a lot of prayers have been answered."

"The pilgrims really gave themselves to the pilgrimage and that made it a spiritual journey," said Bishop Jugis.

SHEPHERDING HIS FLOCK

BISHOP JUGIS REFLECTS ON SECOND YEAR OF SERVICE

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY—EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Two years have passed since Bishop Peter J. Jugis was ordained Oct. 24, 2003, to shepherd the growing and increasingly diverse Diocese of Charlotte.

To celebrate the second anniversary of his ordination as bishop, members of the diocesan pilgrimage to Italy celebrated with a special dinner for Bishop Jugis in Rome Oct. 24.

Coincidentally, Bishop Jugis had studied for the priesthood at the Pontifical North American College in Rome, and was ordained by Pope John Paul II in St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican June 12, 1983.

"During my first two years as bishop, I've enjoyed going around to all the parishes and schools," said Bishop Jugis. "Canon law says a bishop has five years to visit all of his parishes. I think I'll accomplish it by next year."

Bishop Jugis has realized many accomplishments during the past year — numerous confirmations, dedication Masses and visits to Rome. He has encouraged eucharistic adoration as part of the Year of the Eucharist.

But a special highlight, said Bishop Jugis, was the diocese's first Eucharistic Congress, held in Charlotte Sept. 23-24.

"When the idea for the congress presented itself, I said 'let's try that,'" said Bishop Jugis. "I think God has blessed us with that initiative. It was a marvelous opportunity to come together in faith."

"Bishop Jugis is the most spiritual, caring shepherd of his flock," said Mary Niekra, a parishioner of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury and pilgrim to Italy.

"He is truly a very humble man. We are very honored," she said.

"We are delighted to celebrate with you this second anniversary of your ordination as bishop," said Father Christopher Roux, episcopal master of ceremonies, during the dinner.

As a token of their affection, the pilgrims presented Bishop Jugis with a briefcase and a crucifix, similar to one he had seen in a shop during the pilgrimage.

"This is a beautiful reminder of our eucharistic pilgrimage," said Bishop Jugis. "I'm delighted to be your bishop. I wouldn't want to be anywhere else."

Do space aliens have souls?

Inquiring minds can check Jesuit's book

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Galaxy-gazing scientists surely wonder about what kind of impact finding life or intelligent beings on another planet would have on the world.

But what sort of effect would it have on Catholic beliefs?

Would Christian theology be rocked to the core if science someday found a distant orb teeming with intelligent forms of alien life? Would the church send missionaries to spread the Gospel to aliens?

Could aliens even be baptized? Or would they have had their own version of Jesus and have already experienced his universal or galactic plan of salvation?

Curious Catholics need not be space buffs to want answers to these questions and others when they pick up a 48-page booklet by a Vatican astronomer.

Through the British-based Catholic Truth Society, U.S. Jesuit Brother Guy Consolmagno has penned his response to what he says are questions he gets from the public "all the time" when he gives talks on his work with the Vatican Observatory.

Titled "Intelligent Life in the Universe? Catholic Belief and the Search for Extraterrestrial Intelligent Life," the pocket-sized booklet is the latest addition to the society's "Explanations Series," which explores Catholic teaching on current social and ethical issues.

Brother Consolmagno said the whole question of how Catholicism would hold up if some form of life were discovered on another planet has piqued people's curiosity "for centuries."

He said his aim with the booklet was to reassure Catholics "that you shouldn't be afraid of these questions" and that "no matter what we learn, it doesn't invalidate what we already know" and believe.

In other words, scientific study and discovery and religion enrich one another, not cancel out each other.

If new forms of life were to be discovered or highly advanced beings from outer space were to touch down on planet Earth, it would not mean "everything we believe in is wrong," rather, "we're going to find out that everything is truer in ways we couldn't even yet have imagined," he said.

The Book of Genesis describes two stories of creation, and science, too, has more than one version of how the cosmos may have come into being.

"However you picture the universe being created, says Genesis, the essential point is that ultimately it was a deliberate, loving act of a God who exists outside of space and time," Brother Consolmagno said.

"The Bible is divine science, a work about God. It does not intend to be physical science" and explain the making of planets and solar systems, he said.

Pope John Paul II once told scientists, "Truth does not contradict truth," meaning scientific truths will never eradicate religious truths and vice versa.

"When science fills in the details of how God did it, science helps get a flavor of how rich and beautiful and inventive God really is, more than even the writer of Genesis could ever have imagined," Brother Consolmagno said.

The limitless universe "might even include other planets with other beings created by that same loving God," he added. "There is nothing in Holy Scripture that could confirm or contradict the possibility of intelligent life elsewhere in the universe."

Brother Consolmagno said that, like scientists, people of faith should not be afraid of saying "I just don't know."

Human understanding "is always incomplete. It is crazy to underestimate God's ability to create in depths of ways that we will never completely understand. It is equally dangerous to think that we understand God completely," he said.

He said his booklet tries to show "the fun of thinking" about what it would mean if God had created more than life on Earth. Such speculation "is very worthwhile if it makes us reflect on things we do know and have taken for granted," he said.

He said asking such questions as "Would aliens have souls?" or "Does the salvation of Christ apply to them?" helps one "appreciate what it means for us to have a soul" and helps one better "recognize what the salvation of Christ means to us."

Brother Consolmagno said he tried to show that "the church is not afraid of science" and that Catholics, too, should be unafraid and confident in confronting all types of speculation.

The booklet's last chapter reveals where there are references to extraterrestrials in the Bible.

The booklet offers no "hard and fast answers" to extraterrestrial life, but is meant "to put a smile on your face" and, perhaps, make people think twice about who could be peeking at Earth from alien telescopes far, far away.

Wherever there is need, there is Christ

BY DAN LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

It could be an emperor mistaken for a beggar or a queen in disguise or a long lost relative returned to an unsuspecting home, like Odysseus at the end of his journey. However it's played out, the motif of the unrecognized king finds expression in all cultures, all times and places.

The experience of mistaken identity is a popular literary theme because it opens a window on the intentions of people's hearts. We recognize how true it is that people are on their best behavior when they know someone important is watching.

The Gospel for the Solemnity of Christ the King paints for us a dramatic scene of glory revealed and judgment bestowed. There are angels and trumpets, glorious thrones and all the peoples of the world assembled.

So why is there so much surprise in the reaction to Christ's judgment?

Because, beneath all this majesty lies the quiet but decisive truth that Christ is present to us in one another, but in a way that is hidden for now. The behavior on which his judgments are based is not measured against the public standard of how we treat powerful, well-known people, but how we treat the least.

Who among us is thirsty for a cool glass of water or a refreshing word of encouragement? Who are the ill-clad and unprotected in need of the warmth and protection of clothes and inclusion? Where are the strangers waiting to be welcomed into our conversations, our homes and our circles of power?

What are the illnesses and injuries of body, soul and spirit that long for the comfort of gentle hands and kind words? Who are the prisoners, separated from the human community by steel bars and mental handicaps, physical impairments and ignorance?

Wherever there is human need, that's where Christ is. The time to respond is now.

Questions:

Who are some of the people who have helped quench your thirst or made you welcome or freed you from bondage? What is one way you can help your parish community serve Christ in those in need?

Maryknoll, Christophers offer essay, poster contests for students

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Both Maryknoll and the Christophers are sponsoring contests designed to harness the creativity of students.

Maryknoll's student essay contest, open to students in grades six to 12, asks entrants to tell Pope Benedict XVI about the biggest concerns of youths around the world and how the church might help or tell him what they have learned from someone of another faith.

The Christophers' 16th annual poster contest asks students in grades nine to 12 to interpret the theme "You Can Make a Difference" in an original poster, which can feature paintings, photographs, pencil sketches and computer-generated artwork.

"The voice of young people, expressing their own reality and in their own words, can help adults understand what decisions we need to make to create a better, safer and holier world," said Maryknoll Father Joseph R. Veneroso, publisher of Maryknoll magazine.

The deadline for the Maryknoll contest is Dec. 1. Entries in The Christophers' contest must be submitted by Jan. 20.

Young people asked to discern media's messages

BY PRISCILLA GREER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ATLANTA — Teenage participants at the Oct. 27-29 National Catholic Youth Conference in Atlanta were urged to critically discern the countless messages targeting their age group from movies, TV shows, music and magazines.

Mike Patin, a frequent speaker at youth events who has been a youth minister and a high school teacher, told participants at the session on media and culture to "use moderation, self-control (and) better understanding" in what they watch, listen to and read.

Patin took on the current reality shows on television, saying that many of them are "far from realistic," and he also warned against spending too much time on the Internet as a substitute for personal contact.

He noted that some television shows in recent years have been "decent"; they include such shows as "Buffy the Vampire Slayer," "Joan of Arcadia" and "Alias," although of the three only one, "Alias," is still running.

He suggested that teens ask themselves if the programs they watch only allow them to disconnect and escape or to help build better relationships and inspire them. He also said they should always be mindful of what the advertisers are trying to sell them.

Another presenter, Anna Scally, a youth rally speaker and president of Cornerstone Media in Santa Rosa, Calif.,

spoke about the impact of music on today's youths.

She said that despite the often perceived negative influences of modern music she has found that today's popular music unites people and often has positive, affirming messages.

Scally said that about 15 percent of popular songs advocate casual sex, drugs and alcohol. Those songs should be intentionally avoided, she added.

When asked how much music they listen to, many participants at the session said they listen to up to four hours of music a day.

Scally said that since there is no shortage of romantic love songs some that are about unconditional love can be used to pray and contemplate God's love.

"God is speaking to you every day and if you listen to a bad song God may be calling you to hear a better message," said Scally. "Psalm 150 says praise the Lord with all instruments, let all creation sing praise. ... Were songs only meant to be inspired in those days or is Our Lord speaking to us every single day through our music, our church, our sacraments, through our friends who love us?"

Brittany Smith, one of the conference participants, said she appreciated how the speakers met teens at their level and did not just say the media was all bad.

"(While) some of us may not be able to stay on course, the majority of us can think for ourselves," she said. "We just need to be more careful in determining what is good and what is bad."

Hearing examines if fetuses feel pain

House becomes law.

The Unborn Child Pain Awareness Act of 2005, introduced in January by Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., got its first hearing Nov. 1 before the Subcommittee on the Constitution of the House Judiciary Committee.

The legislation would require medical professionals to inform women seeking abortions — if their unborn child has reached “a probable stage of development of 20 weeks after fertilization” — that there is “substantial evidence that the (abortion) will cause the unborn child pain, and that the mother has the option of having pain-reducing drugs administered directly to the child.”

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., has introduced a similar measure in the Senate.

“The topic of pain of the unborn, including whether, how early and to what extent an unborn child feels pain, ignites heated debate,” said Rep. Steve Chabot, R-Ohio, subcommittee chairman and a co-sponsor of the bill.

“Yet 77 percent of the individuals surveyed in an April 2004 Zogby International poll favor a law requiring that women who are 20 weeks or more along in their pregnancy be given information about pain of the unborn before having an abortion,” he said.

Dr. Kanwaljeet Anand, professor of pediatrics, anesthesiology, neurobiology and developmental sciences at the University of Arkansas for Medical Sciences, said the topic of fetal pain “deserves a scientific appraisal that is independent from the highly controversial and partisan issues surrounding abortion, women’s rights or philosophical projections about the beginning of human life.”

Anand disputed the findings of a review of earlier studies published in August in the Journal of the American Medical Association, which concluded that fetal perception of pain is unlikely until 29 to 30 weeks after fertilization.

“The conclusions ... are flawed because they ignore a large body of research related to pain processing in the brain, present a faulty scientific rationale and use inconsistent methodology for their systematic review,” said Anand.

“Based on the available scientific evidence, we cannot dismiss the high likelihood of fetal pain perception before the third trimester of human gestation,” he said.

Teresa Collett, a law professor at the University of St. Thomas School of Law, said the conclusions of the August article also were contrary to that of the British Medical Association, which said in 1999 that “due consideration must be given to appropriate measures for minimizing the risk of pain” to the fetus, both in abortions and in therapeutic interventions.

“If there is a single issue in the abortion debate where common ground could be found, one would hope it might be on the issue of ensuring that women who obtain abortions at 20 weeks or later be informed of the possibility of fetal pain and their options to relieve that pain,” Collett added.

To a certain degree, that consensus already exists. When the bill was introduced in January, Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, said her organization did not oppose the legislation.

But Arthur Caplan, chairman of the department of medical ethics at the University of Pennsylvania School of Medicine, strongly objected to the proposed law, calling it “an unwise interference with the practice of medicine by Congress” that could have “enormous ramifications for the future practice of medicine.”

Caplan said that because the medical profession has not reached a consensus about when a fetus is capable of pain, legislation mandating that a “physician represent something as a fact which is not known to be true or agreed upon by the majority of medical and scientific experts as valid would not only be poor public policy, it would set a terrible precedent for other topics where Congress might choose to mandate disclosure about ‘facts’ for political or even ethical reasons which have no foundation in science or medicine.”

Offering the most hands-on testimony at the hearing was Dr. Jean Wright, executive director of Children’s Hospital and Women’s Institute at Memorial Health University Medical Center in Savannah, Ga., who traced the history of pediatric anesthesia since the early 1980s, when “little or no pain management” was offered to premature infants undergoing major surgery.

Today, however, “our understanding of the presence of pain and the need to clinically treat this pain in the premature infants leads us to understand the presence of pain and the need to treat pain in the unborn fetus of the same gestational age,” Wright said.

“We no longer can ignore the fact that maternal anesthesia treats the mother’s pain perception during these procedures, but leaves the unborn with no pain protection,” she said.

Where is Satan in the Bible?

Q. In my grade school days more than 50 years ago, the nuns told us the story of an angel named Lucifer, whose name means Light-bearer and who was very close to God; but this angel got the idea he was better than God.

Lucifer gathered a bunch of rogue angels about him and rebelled, so the story goes. They were banished to the nether regions, wherever that is, thus creating hell. I've read the Bible a good bit but don't recall seeing reference to such a confrontation.

Is there reference to this battle, apparently between the devil, or Satan, and God? Are angels fallible creatures, capable of making big mistakes like this one? (Illinois)

A. The New Testament contains numerous references to a Satan who is in conflict with Jesus and his followers, most notably perhaps in the stories of the temptation of Jesus in the desert at the beginning of his public life.

The major reference to the heavenly conflict you mention is in the book of Revelation (12:7-9), which speaks of a war between Michael and his angels and the ancient serpent (called the devil or Satan) and its angels. The serpent, or dragon, was cast down to earth, along with its angels.

Details about this Satan, however, are difficult to pin down in the Scriptures. The word itself is a Hebrew expression designating an accuser in a court of law, in other words an adversary.

In the book of Job, for example, he is a member of the heavenly court, one of God's advisers, who is obviously, however, no friend of human beings (Job 1:6-12). In other Old Testament Jewish traditions, Satan gradually takes on his more evil characteristics.

The name Lucifer is traced to a passage in the prophet Isaiah (Chapter 14), which speaks of a "shining star, son of the dawn" (in Hebrew "Helel ben Shahar"), who said "I will be like the most high." This passage occurs in an extended, taunting sarcasm against the pagan king of Babylon, enemy of the Jewish people.

According to the New Jerome Biblical Commentary and most Bible scholars today, Isaiah is applying to the king the myth of a god named "shining star, son of the dawn," who "aspired to ascend the mountain of the gods and make himself equal to Elyon," to God.

Some fathers of the church saw in this passage a parallel to the battle described in Revelation and translated the name Helel ben Shahar directly into the Latin name Lucifer, which means, as you say, the bearer of the light of dawn, the morning star. Thus the beautiful name Lucifer became an unlikely Christian name for the devil or Satan.

For centuries Catholic teaching has been that some angels sinned against God in such a grave way that they lost their presence with God forever. Details are sparse. The only ones we have are from the few passages in the Gospels and other New Testament books I refer to above.

The personality of angels, from what we are able to theorize, would be such that their knowledge would be more immediate and encompassing than ours could be, their decisions more definitive. There would be no new later insights or wonder to bring them to repentance.

It's a most interesting subject, but that's about as far as we can go in our speculation about the fall of the angels and its consequences.

World is 'intelligent project' that reflects divine origin, pope says

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said that far from being a product of chance the created world is an "intelligent project" that reflects a divine origin.

The pope made the remarks at a general audience at the Vatican Nov. 9, commenting about Psalm 136, which gives thanks for creation.

The pope quoted St. Basil the Great, who in the fourth century warned that some people, "fooled by the atheism that they carry inside them, imagine the universe deprived of direction and order, as if at the mercy of chance."

Speaking extemporaneously to the crowd in St. Peter's Square, the pope said St. Basil's words had "surprising relevance" today.

"How many people are there today who, fooled by atheism, think and try to demonstrate that it would be scientific to think that everything is without direction and order," he said.

"Through sacred Scripture, the Lord reawakens the reason that sleeps and tells us that in the beginning is the creative word, the creative reason, the reason that has created everything, that has created this intelligent project," he said.

The pope said it was important to understand that "the cosmos is also love." He said Psalm 136 correctly points to the created world as the place to find visible signs of divine charity.

"The signs of God's love are seen in the marvels of creation and in the great gifts he has given to his people. The Fathers of the Church teach us to recognize in created things the greatness of God and his merciful love toward us," he said.

St. Basil, he said, was filled with wonder as he reflected upon the mystery of creation. The pope quoted the saint's description of God as "beauty greater than any that can be desired, the beginning of all beings, the source of life, the light of understanding, inaccessible wisdom."

The pope said the presence of God in creation was a "cosmic revelation" available to everyone, but he said one must have "clear eyes" to contemplate and understand this revelation, a process that is aided by prayer.

He said the reading of Psalm 136 also underlines that the creator addressed in prayer is "not a cold, distant God, but one who loves his creatures and suffers when they are unfaithful to him, when they reject his merciful fatherly affection."

Thanksgiving: Remembering times God smiled upon us

Those of us spared by hurricanes and earthquakes have much to be grateful for this Thanksgiving! And if we are enjoying good health, a secure job and a happy living situation, we have all the more reason to be grateful.

But is Thanksgiving really a time to reflect on how much better off we are than others? It should be a special time for reflecting on graces we've received from God.

Grace is the life that comes of an "I-thou" relationship with God — a taste of heaven on earth, you might say.

As horrific as recent disasters were, the goodness of people reaching out to help others was truly a memorable moment — a time when "we" experienced "Thy" goodness, O Lord.

Out of the goodness and generosity of their hearts, people gave like never before, and not just financial outpouring.

Families opened their homes to those who lost theirs. Schools made room for children whose schools were destroyed. Doctors and rescue workers left rushed to aid others. The military distributed food, rescued people and restored order.

In Latin, the word "care" is closely related to the word "cure." What we experienced this past year was truly Christ's care and healing among us. We found ourselves in an unforgettable time when humans performed like the human beings they are meant to be — reflections of their Creator.

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

Recent disasters are reminders that as bad as things seem at times, the goodness of God far outweighs the evil he allows. In fact, we have to wonder if God doesn't seek every opportunity to draw goodness out of evil in order to raise us to new levels of human excellence.

Certainly, strangers coming together to support each other lets us ponder how often during 2005 we experienced such excellence in others and in ourselves.

Perhaps it was at a moment of unforeseen trouble when someone appeared to help. Perhaps it was an anonymous nurse at our bedside soothing our fears, or the courteous remark of a bus driver, or unexpected words of thanks.

Suddenly there was the grace of an I-Thou relationship — the "I" being touched by the goodness of "Thou."

Somewhere I once read that "a smile is gone in a flash but its memory lingers forever." Thanksgiving is a time to resurrect our memories of the times God smiled upon us.

Is this Heaven? No, it's Vegas

Money doesn't bring happiness; Jesus does

As North Carolina moves into the little league of gambling, with the state-sponsored lottery, I recently revisited the major leagues. My wife Deborah and I spent a few days in big, gaudy, naughty Las Vegas, the sun-baked desert town that was built on cheap drinks, media hype, headline entertainment and the brass ring promise of fabulous riches.

I've visited Vegas many times on business. Deborah had never been. Neither of us cares for gambling, but still we managed to lose $10 on the slots. To me the city's well-known slogan, "What happens here, stays here," should be twisted to, "What is bet here, stays here."

Without gambling as an attraction for us, we spent a lot of time checking out the architecture and ambiance of the resorts that dot both downtown and "the strip." What, we wondered, is the soul of Vegas?

Even if you don't play the games, you can't avoid the smoky casinos. You have to pass through them to get to everything from a restroom to a restaurant to the theatres that house the spectacular shows and the hokey Elvis impersonators.

The casinos are the heart of the city. The gleeful sounds of the hopeful gamblers mix with the clanging sirens of the slots and an endless buzz of anticipation that the next pull, the next toss of the dice, the next card is going to transform someone. Into what? A winner!

Everyone knows that Vegas is fake, but wow — what a phony! The faux "skyline" of the hotel/casino New York, New York is truly evocative of the great city. I haven't seen the Eiffel Tower, but the replica outside the Paris casino is pretty impressive, and ditto for the Renaissance ceiling paintings in the Venetian hotel. The fountains at the Bellagio will convince you that water can dance.

Churches? Those were hard to find, unless, of course, you count the wedding chapels.

This colossal playground of buildings, entertainment, food and "beautiful people" is an exotic, intoxicating mixture. As a sensual experience, Vegas has everything — or at least it has everything that man can create to attract, amuse, absorb and convince us that this is as good as it gets.

What gets you in to this heaven on earth? Money. You can bring it or you can win it. If you do, out rolls the red carpet and everyone is your friend.

But Vegas has a sad side, too. What large city doesn't? Do the assorted winos, hard-edged women and cycle-less biker types who sleep in the public parks have serious problems, or are they just down on their luck? After all, nearly everyone in Vegas is unlucky; the city was built on losers, not winners.

After hours of walking, our conclusion was not really a revelation. Las Vegas has no soul. But the essential question for every gambler who has ever said "Hit me!" is the same there as it is for people in Charlotte or Asheville or Winston-Salem. How do I win in this life?

The answer, the winning ticket, for everyone is to follow Jesus Christ. It may not bring earthly riches, but you won't have the feeling I heard expressed on a monorail ride between casinos.

A well-dressed man, who claimed to have won a great deal at a roulette table, was wondering, "Is this all there is?"

Vegas is a lot of fun, but for me the jackpot was in realizing that you don't have to go there to be a winner.

Keeping poverty in the headlines

Guest Column

TERRI JARINA
GUEST COLUMNIST

People living in poverty made the headlines for weeks following the devastation of hurricanes Katrina and Rita. In recent weeks those stories seem to have waned — poverty is no longer newsworthy.

But even when it does not make the headlines, poverty abounds. Nearly 37 million Americans, many working full time, are unable to provide the basic needs of their families. One in six children and one in 10 families are among the working poor. One million more Americans fall into poverty every year.

The "poverty line" set by the U.S. government for a family of four is $18,810 to provide the basic necessities. In 2002-2003, North Carolina ranked 10th in our nation with a poverty rate of 14.2 percent.

That same year our state had the third greatest increase in poverty (1.6 percent).

As the body of Christ, Catholics believe that we share the griefs and anxieties of those who live in poverty. We also can share the joys and the hope that come from joining together to break the cycle of poverty.

The Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CCHD) supports thousands of projects that empower poor and low-income people to join together in order to solve their community problems. CCHD-funded groups in the Diocese of Charlotte organize for racial justice, focus on tolerance and cultural awareness, provide emergency and life-skill assistance, help homeless families secure permanent housing and empower low-income immigrant workers in advocacy efforts.

The CCHD collection will be taken up in parishes the weekend of Nov. 19-20.

In the last three years, your generosity has contributed to these and other projects to help break the cycle of poverty for many in our nation and in our diocese. CCHD-funded projects from Asheboro and Hamlet to Morganton and Boone unite individuals across racial and religious boundaries as they address the root causes of poverty where they exist.

For many, these projects provide their first opportunity to have a voice in how a project or organization is developed. Some even find that they have a voice in changing the social structures that mire them in poverty.

CCHD supports community-controlled, self-help organizations. CCHD also is committed to being a significant partner in the Gulf Coast rebuilding efforts. With your continued generous support we can look for headlines that announce a decrease in poverty.

Does God still love this person?

We are all part of the body of Christ

"I am deeply troubled," a reader recently wrote, "and need your help. I have spent my life trying to be a good Catholic: receiving the sacraments, giving to my church, showing acts of kindness. ... I love my church and believe in the Nicene Creed."

But, the reader said, "I see both sides on many issues — like birth control, married clergy, etc. ... When I read articles that suggest that Catholics who are not in full compliance with the teachings of the church should leave the church that they love, I become sad."

"Doesn't our Lord love us all, even though we try so hard to understand? I know there are millions like me. If you can provide any advice I would appreciate it."

Here is my reply:

Dear Brother in Christ: Yes, our Lord does love us all as we try to do the right thing, even unbelievers. Trust in his mercy. Don't even think about leaving, no matter what anyone says.

You are an important part of our community of faith. If you are troubled, find a good priest to talk with about your concerns.

Here is a little principle from moral theology which has stood the test of time. I hope it helps you: Unity in necessary things, freedom in doubtful things and charity in all things.

In order for the church to remain true to Jesus Christ, she must remain faithful to his core teachings.

Doctrinal integrity is essential if the church is to be the same for people in every century. She can't change from century to century to satisfy the logical objections of each age. This requires constancy and clarity in matters of doctrine.

Unity in "necessary things" means that each of us must try to make the leap of faith even when to do so seems to go against logic. Many refuse to believe that God is love; they feel it doesn't make sense in the wake of a tsunami or Katrina.

But we are not rationalists who demand evidence before we believe. The leap of faith transcends logic because it is theological. It based on revelation, not human logic.

You say you accept the Creed. That means you believe that Jesus Christ is "true God and true man." Good for you; that is a leap of faith. You are part of the Catholic heritage.

Those who deny the Lord's divinity are called heretics. They are still members of the people of God, but are not Catholics in the strict sense.

However, in moral matters a Catholic has a right and a duty to follow his or her conscience. No, the human conscience does not replace the church's magisterium in these matters, it merely tries to apply the teaching to one's particular circumstances.

And we must make the effort to form our consciences well.

But you are still part of the body of Christ. The church is a port in the storm of life for you and for everyone in need of healing and forgiveness. And does God still love you? I am certain of it.

LENOIR — Franciscan friars arrived in Caldwell County in 1932. Through their pastorate, a number of western North Carolina Catholic communities were ministered to, among them the congregation that came to be known as St. Francis of Assisi Church in Lenoir.

Bishop William J. Hafey of Raleigh invited the Franciscan Fathers of the New York province to provide missionary resources to the western half of the Diocese of Raleigh. (The Diocese of Charlotte was not founded until 1972.) Property in central Lenoir was purchased in December 1932, and the house that resided on it became St. Francis Friary.

In January 1933, three Franciscan missionaries gathered in the friary chapel with a four-member congregation to celebrate the first Mass in Caldwell County. Later that month, Bishop Hafey assigned the Franciscans to ministerial work in Statesville.

In Lenoir, the friary chapel soon became too small to accommodate the growing congregation. The present church property was purchased in the mid-1930s, and ground was broken in May 1936. Bishop Hafey dedicated the structure five months later, placing it under the patronage of St. Francis of Assisi.

Following parish growth in the 1950s, diocesan priests assumed pastoral responsibility in Lenoir, thereby ending the Franciscan ministry that had existed for three decades in the area.

The parish is active in a several ministerial outreach programs. The Lenoir Soup Kitchen, founded decades ago at St. Francis of Assisi Church, now exists as an independent service to the community. A number of St. Francis parishioners volunteer at the soup kitchen as well as at the Yokefellow Christian Service Center and Habitat for Humanity.

A variety of parish organizations and programs provide parishioners of various age groups with service and social opportunities. Ecumenism is also a highlight of parish life, as St. Francis of Assisi Church joins with local Episcopal and Lutheran churches in Advent services and summer vacation Bible school sessions for children and adults.

On Oct. 27, 2000, then-Bishop William G. Curlin dedicated a new church, designed by Alan Stewart, an architect and a St. Francis of Assisi parishioner.

Stewart took great care to preserve many of the original church's design elements in the new structure. The original church's crucifix, Stations of the Cross, statues, stained glass windows and other artifacts found a home in the new church, designed to be more accommodating to parishioners with disabilities and to allow more accessibility in liturgical celebrations.

Like so many parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte, St. Francis of Assisi Church has seen its community grow through the influx of Hispanics into the area. Father Matthew Leonard, pastor, celebrates Mass each Sunday in Spanish. The parish also has an active Hispanic ministry.

Each year on Oct. 3, members of the Fraternity of Brother Francis gather to celebrate the Transitus (the death) of St. Francis of Assisi.

Like the patron of their church, St. Francis of Assisi parishioners dedicate themselves to serving God and their community through liturgical celebrations, caring for the needy, evangelization and preservation of the environment.

Nun runs New York Marathon to support program for women, children

BROOKLYN, N.Y. (CNS) — For Sister of St. Joseph Janet Kinney, running the New York City Marathon and directing Providence House, a transitional home program for women and children, have a lot in common.

It was the similarities that pushed Sister Kinney to consider pursuing her first marathon Nov. 6. One of 36,000 athletes in the New York event, she finished with a time of 5 hours, 7 minutes and 29 seconds.

"When I realized that the marathon is 26.2 miles long and that Providence House will be 26.2 years old in November, the coincidence was just too much to pass up. I said I really have to run it," she said.

After making the decision to run it, she began training five to six days a week, covering up to 40 miles a week, as well as doing some cross-training, such as aerobic exercises.

"I get up about 5 a.m. so I can get in my miles before morning prayer with the sisters here at Providence House," she said.

Not one to miss a chance to help others, Sister Kinney ran to collect funds for Providence House, which currently takes in about 160 formerly incarcerated women and their children in transitional homes and apartment programs.

A letter went out to her supporters asking them to sponsor her by giving $1 or $2 per mile; her Providence House co-workers turned out to cheer on their director.

Sister Kinney said the hospitality always shown to runners by New York City on the day of the marathon reminded her of the hospitality offered at Providence House.

"I find similarities between the spirit of the marathon and the core values of hospitality, compassion and hope that distinguish Providence House," she said.

"At any hour of the day or night, the women and children who are sheltered at our residences are welcomed with open hearts and unconditional love by the sisters and lay staff," she said. "They are not only offered an immediate safe haven, but a home they can call their own — something too many of our residents have never known in their lives."

She also emphasized that the hope that keeps Providence House alive is the same hope that keeps marathoners striving to do better year after year.

Congressional leaders urge Bush to highlight rights in China

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Members of Congress and an independent agency urged President George W. Bush to put human rights and religious freedom at the top of his agenda during his Nov. 19-21 visit to Beijing to meet with Chinese President Hu Jintao.

"I urge the president to speak out boldly and not privately" about the Chinese government's repressive human rights violations, Rep. Frank Wolf, R-Va., said during a press conference at the Capitol Nov. 9. "Economic freedom has not resulted in religious freedom."

The entire underground church in China, including Protestants and Catholics, suffers because of systematic repression by the Chinese government, said Rep. Christopher Smith, R-N.J.

During a question-and-answer session, Smith, a Catholic, urged Bush to impose sanctions and penalties, if necessary, to get China to change its policy on religious freedom. Smith said he was "calling on the president to enter into that kind of dialogue."

At the press conference, representatives of the independent U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom released a letter to Bush and a policy report that included recommendations for the United States. The letter said Chinese Catholics and Protestants not registered with one of the five patriotic or government-approved religious associations are "particularly vulnerable" to religious persecution.

For example, two underground Catholic priests were detained Oct. 27 after celebrating Mass to mark the end of the Year of the Eucharist.

In a report released Nov. 8 by the State Department, China received the lowest ranking concerning religious freedom for the seventh year in a row. Myanmar, Cuba and North Korea joined China in the classification of "totalitarian or authoritarian actions to control religious beliefs or practice."

Pope encourages quick completion of English Mass translation

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI expressed his hope that a new English translation of the Mass prayers would be completed soon.

Writing to members of the Vox Clara Committee, a Vatican-appointed commission of English-speaking bishops, the pope said the new translation from Latin will allow the English-speaking faithful around the world to "benefit from the use of liturgical texts accurately rendered."

Seven of the 12 bishops on the Vox Clara Committee met Nov. 8-10 at the Vatican. The committee was established in 2001 to help the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments evaluate English translations of liturgical texts submitted to the Vatican for approval.

The pope said he was confident that with Vox Clara's assistance "the translation of the 'Missale Romanum' (the Roman Missal) into English will succeed in transmitting the treasures of the faith and the liturgical tradition in the specific context of a devout and reverent eucharistic celebration."

Pope John Paul II promulgated the Latin edition of the Roman Missal in 2002.

The International Commission on English in the Liturgy, a body established by English-speaking bishops' conferences, is translating the Latin text into English. After a national bishops' conference votes to adopt a text, it is forwarded to the Vatican for approval by the worship and sacraments congregation.

A Nov. 10 press release from Vox Clara said the members were informed by ICEL that a "projected schedule" had been drawn up that called for ICEL to complete its translation of the Roman Missal in sections over "the next 23 months."

Catholic Women will host a Christmas Tea Dec. 7, 2:30-4:30 p.m., at the Knights of Columbus Hall, 2780 Horse Pen Creek Rd. For more information, please call Carmen Wood at (336) 545-9266.

Pope urges Iraqis to persevere for peace, not lose hope

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI called on the people of Iraq, especially its Chaldean Catholic community, to not give up hope and to persevere in their efforts for peace and reconciliation.

The pope offered "a word of fervent encouragement" to the Chaldean faithful "and to all citizens of Iraq" during a private audience with Chaldean Patriarch Emmanuel-Karim Delly of Baghdad, Iraq, and a group of Chaldean bishops.

The pope coupled his expression of solidarity with his "assurances of my prayers that your beloved country, even (in its) present difficult situation, may know to not lose heart and to follow the path toward reconciliation and peace," he said.

He asked the patriarch and his brother bishops to remain dedicated to their pastoral duties "and to your ministry of hope for the whole Iraqi nation."

The pope's meeting with the Chaldean leaders came at the end of their Nov. 8-12 extraordinary synod of bishops held in Rome.

Patriarch Delly said "the tragic situation that is spreading across our martyred country" forced the bishops to hold the synod in Rome instead of where it is traditionally held, in Iraq.

The patriarch thanked the pope "for his paternal concern shown toward" the Chaldean community.

The Chaldean church is an Eastern Catholic church whose members enjoy the same dignity, rights and obligations as members of the Latin rite.

Patriarch Delly told the pope that during their synod the bishops considered "an update of our eucharistic liturgy of Addai and Mari" as well as the rights of the lay faithful in the Chaldean church.

The Anaphora of Addai and Mari is an ancient eucharistic prayer that is just one of the eucharistic prayers of the Chaldean liturgy.

The Vatican approved the liturgical changes, but it is now up to the Chaldean bishops to "determine their own liturgy with a vote in a synod," he said.

The Nov. 12 meeting with Iraqi Chaldeans was just one of a number of private audiences the pope held recently with leaders from Iraq.

All the students then said the Pledge of Allegiance and sang "God Bless America."

FEMA gave bishops 'run around' on disaster aid, says archbishop

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Church officials got the "run around" from the Federal Emergency Management Agency when they wanted to know what federal plans were for helping the regions devastated by Hurricane Katrina, said the head of the bishops' hurricane relief task force.

The criticism of FEMA came from Archbishop Joseph A. Fiorenza of Galveston-Houston, named earlier this year to head the task force coordinating church aid to the regions devastated by hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Bishops' conference officials had several conference calls with the White House before Jim Towey, head of the White House Office for Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, was appointed as a liaison to the bishops, but still "the answers we were getting were not clear," said Archbishop Fiorenza Nov. 15.

Knights earn fourth-degrees at ceremony

BY DEACON GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

DURHAM — Knights of Columbus from both the dioceses of Charlotte and Raleigh were exemplified at a recent ceremony.

During the record-breaking fourth-degree exemplification ceremony in Durham Oct. 29, more than 200 knights — including six priests, one deacon and one religious brother — became “sir knights” by earning their fourth-degree statuses.

The organization also celebrated its 100th-year anniversary of exemplification in North Carolina.

Knights from the Diocese of Charlotte included: Jesuit Father Joseph Kappes, parochial vicar at St. Therese of Lisieux Church in Mooresville, of Michael J. Sabella Assembly No. 2417 in Denver; and Deacon Gerald Potkay, permanent deacon at Holy Infant Church in Reidsville, of the Abbot Vincent G. Taylor Assembly No. 779 in Greensboro.

Mass was celebrated by Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin of Charlotte, state chaplain of the Knights of Columbus.

Candidates instituted as acolytes

Sixteen candidates for the permanent diaconate pray during the Mass for Institution of Acolytes at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte Nov. 12.

After six-and-a-half years of diaconate training, the acolytes will be ordained as permanent deacons in June 2006. Their training has included three-and-a-half years of formation preparation, six months of spiritual direction and completion of the two-year lay ministry program.

“My brothers, you are being instituted in an official ministry of the (Catholic) Church,” said Bishop Peter J. Jugis in his homily. “Strive to live the example of love that is revealed in the Lord's sacrifice on the altar.”

A deacon is an ordained minister in the Catholic Church and is one of the three forms of the sacrament of Holy Orders, the origins of which can be found in the Acts of the Apostles. Once ordained, permanent deacons may perform many of the sacramental ministries of the church except consecration of the Eucharist, anointing of the sick and reconciliation.

Seniors gather for physical, spiritual well-being

BY CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — Like Bob Hope on a Christmas tour for the Armed Forces, Benedictine Father Kieran Neilson fired off one joke or anecdote after another, leaving his audience breathless from laughter.

"It's wonderful to be able to laugh," said Father Neilson, chaplain of Belmont Abbey College in Belmont. "Only a Southerner knows that the word 'funny' can be used as a noun, verb or adverb."

Father Neilson was the keynote speaker at the Senior Fall Day of Reflection, which brought together senior citizens from several parishes to St. Eugene Church in Asheville Oct. 27.

The diocese's Elder Ministry sponsored the annual event, which was held also at St. Mark Church in Huntersville Oct. 13 with keynote speaker Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor of St. Pius X Church in Greensboro, and at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory Oct. 20 with speaker Father Ed Sheridan, pastor of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte.

Elder Ministry, a part of Catholic Social Services' Family Life Office, provides leadership and guidance to parishes and older adults within the diocese to enhance their well-being and to promote the development of programs for their benefit.

Each year, Elder Ministry serves more than 600 senior Catholics in the diocese through annual events such as the Senior Fall Day of Reflection and Spring Fling, said Sandra Breakfield, director of Elder Ministry.

'You need to appreciate the blessings God has given and use them to the best of your abilities, and you will be happy.'

This year, more than 300 seniors attended the three Fall Day of Reflection sessions, she said.

"With the help of many hard-working volunteers, Elder Ministry provides programs that enrich the physical, psychological and spiritual well-being of senior adults throughout the Diocese of Charlotte," said Breakfield.

Jerry Bergeron, pastoral associate at St. Eugene Church, was instrumental in bringing the Fall Day of Reflection to the Asheville area this year.

in Growing Older," encouraged participants to be happy, but, he said, suffering is also a part of life.

There are millions of people less fortunate in the world, said Father Neilson.

"You need to appreciate the blessings God has given and use them to the best of your abilities, and you will be happy," he told the participants.

Father Neilson, who recently celebrated his 50th anniversary as a monk, offered the participants five ways to find happiness: "Free your heart from hatred, free your mind from worries, live simply, give more, expect less."

He also said that Jesus told us to take care of today and let tomorrow take care of itself. Problems can't be solved by worrying about them, said Father Neilson.

"If you can say that what you are doing now is not helping with your situation, you are uselessly worrying," said Father Neilson. "If faced with something you know will happen, you try to prepare. Anxiety is destructive, passive and does nothing to solve a problem."

Father Neilson suggested that seniors, if worried or anxious, try meditating on God's sacrifice on the cross.

"To handle troubles today, trust in God," he said. "It will work."

Father Neilson said that people often try to judge the effectiveness of their prayers, and that our more difficult times of prayer are often the most effective.

"What God asks is that we persevere and be constant in our prayer," said Father Neilson. "Prayer is the conscious awareness of the presence of God."

Father Neilson's message and sense of humor were a big hit with many of the participants.

"One of the best things about it is that I can't remember ever having had such a good time," said Flora Snipes, a parishioner of St. Eugene Church. "I learned about our faith amidst a lot of laughter. You remember it when you laugh about it."

chapel. "It is the real presence of Christ which makes the difference, adding a richness to the prayer as opposed to praying elsewhere."

Led by Redemptorist Father Alvaro A. Riquelme, administrator of St. Joseph Church, the chapel was installed to enhance adoration of the Blessed Sacrament for the Year of the Eucharist.

In October 2004, Pope John Paul II launched a worldwide Year of the Eucharist to promote understanding of and devotion to the Eucharist.

Father Riquelme felt the parish needed a small, intimate chapel for adoration. Over the course of seven months, just such a chapel was built within the main church.

"We want to be known as a 'eucharistic church,'" said Father Riquelme.

"The love of Jesus remains at the very heart of the Church's life," said Bishop Jugis. "Eucharistic worship gives life to all the ministries of the parish ...

(and) to our Christian life in our homes and in our places of work."

Jorge Nuñez, a parishioner of St. Joseph Church, painted the murals for the chapel. On the front wall, Byzantine-style murals portray Jesus Christ, Our Lady of Perpetual Help and St. Alphonsus Liguori. A portrait of Pope John Paul II is on the right-side wall.

"Our vocation as disciples of Christ is to love," Bishop Jugis told the congregation. "In the eucharistic sacrifice, Jesus has forever placed love at the heart of the Church."

LIVING THE FAITH

Local Catholic reflects on canonized relative spent a lifetime in devotion to the poor and elderly. Gaetano was our cousin. Our cousin the saint.

That morning, on a day so bright and gorgeous it seemed stage-managed by a higher power, I stood with my wife and daughters, my parents, my brother and sister, my two nieces and more than four dozen aunts, uncles and cousins to witness this extraordinary event.

A huge banner portraying Gaetano hung between the tall pillars of St. Peter's Basilica. The family resemblance is uncanny, sending chills through many of us. And when the pope stood beneath those banners of the saints to start the ceremony, flanked by scores of robed cardinals, bishops and a choir whose angelic voices filled the square, it was a moment as rich and memorable as any we've ever shared as a family.

For three-and-a-half hours, Pope Benedict XVI led a solemn and mystical celebration where not a single word of English was spoken. He praised the lives of the new saints, calling them role models for Catholics around the world. He accepted gifts from the advocates of the saints, who had come from Sicily, Ukraine, Poland and Chile. And he smiled often at the sheer emotion bursting from the vast international crowd.

"Today I have the joy of presiding for the first time over a canonization rite," the new pope said in Italian.

Some of us could understand a few words being spoken by Pope Benedict. But the one that came through most clearly, that elicited cheers from tight pockets of people throughout the square, was simply "Catanoso."

"To hear the pope say our family name again and again, and to know that we're connected to the man being sainted. Well, it's the experience of a lifetime," said Anthony Catanoso, my cousin from New Jersey.

Family ties

So who exactly was St. Gaetano Catanoso? And what led Pope John Paul II, in one of his last acts before his death earlier this year, to approve him for sainthood?

Gaetano was a cousin of my grandfather, Carmelo Catanoso. They were born a few years apart in the late 1800s in Chorio di San Lorenzo, a town in Reggio di Calabria province in southern Italy, but they chose radically different paths.

While my grandfather decided to leave behind the poverty of his region for a new life in America, his cousin stayed behind to ease the pain of so much suffering all around him.

Gaetano became a priest in 1902. He was noted for his great humility and devotion to the church. He made a special point to hike into remote mountain villages to bring the Gospel and hope to the poor and isolated.

In 1934, he founded an order of nuns, the Daughters of St. Veronica, Missionaries of the Holy Face, to serve with him to further his outreach.

In weathering a devastating earthquake and two World Wars, Gaetano was said to see the face of Christ in all who suffered, especially orphans, children, the elderly and the poor. For a time, he ran a prison ministry and a hospital ministry.

Near the end of his life, he raised funds to build a simple but beautiful church in Reggio di Calabria, with a motherhouse for the Veronican Sisters. Their mission has since spread to South Africa and the Philippines.

When Gaetano died in 1963, the nuns were so convinced of his saintliness that they immediately began the process of Catholic veneration with the Vatican. In the years that passed, the church attributed two healing miracles to the late priest.

But becoming a saint also requires having "lived a life of heroic virtue," according to Vatican rules. Pope John Paul II, eager to promote Catholic role models around the world through canonizations, recognized those virtues in our cousin.

What it means

In all, more than 5,000 people traveled from Calabria to Rome on Oct. 23 to cheer for St. Gaetano Catanoso; more than 100 were Catanoso relatives from Reggio, a city located six hours south in the toe of Italy's boot.

"It is a great challenge to us, his holiness," Veronican Sister Lourdes Carpio told me. "We cannot remain quiet. We cannot keep this in our motherhouse. We have to do everything we can so that his lessons to us might be known to the world."

In my family, the impact is more subtle, more personal.

Nearly a year ago, I lost a brother to cancer. During his ordeal, my family asked Gaetano, who was no remote religious figure, to intercede for us. For my parents to be in St. Peter's Square that morning with their remaining children and my late brother's wife and daughters went a long way toward healing the loss we all still feel.

Other family members were touched in different ways. One cousin could not make the trip. When the canonization started, her sister called via cell phone from the square and left the line open so they could share the experience together, in tears.

My Aunt Leona Catanoso Betz, who is rarely at a loss for words, was overwhelmed: "It's a miracle that it even happened. We have been blessed with something we never thought in our dear lives would come to us."

But perhaps my cousin Anthony said it best: "St. Gaetano gave us this precious experience and made me realize that it's not just about a name. Being a Catanoso is about being fortunate enough to have the unconditional love of family — to have ties that only continue to strengthen over time."

"The memories from this experience and the tales of our cousin, St. Gaetano, will be shared with future Catanos for generations," he said.

St. Gaetano Catanoso revived devotions, founded order

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Christ's suffering out of love for humanity led St. Gaetano Catanoso to a devotion to the "holy face of Christ," a devotion seen in the religious order he founded, in his commitment to eucharistic adoration and in works of charity.

The Italian diocesan priest, who lived 1879-1963, was one of five men in the first group of saints proclaimed by Pope Benedict XVI.

At the Oct. 23 canonization ceremony, the pope said that daily Mass and frequent eucharistic adoration "were the soul" of the priesthood for St. Gaetano.

"With zealous and untiring pastoral charity, he dedicated himself to preaching, catechesis, the ministry of confessions, to the poor, the sick and the care of priestly vocations," the pope said.

He added that the priest's "spirit of charity, humility and sacrifice" was transmitted to the Daughters of St. Veronica, Missionaries of the Holy Face, the religious order he founded in 1934.

Catanoso entered the minor seminary at the age of 10 and was ordained to the priesthood in 1902. Among the many campaigns he conducted later in life was the "Institution for Poor Clerics," a campaign to raise scholarship money for poor boys who felt they had a vocation to the priesthood, but whose families could not afford the seminary tuition.

In 1904 he was assigned to a rural parish and served there for almost 17 years, promoting devotion to the Holy Face, including establishing a confraternity committed to prayer and charity.

The rural areas of Reggio di Calabria were extremely poor, had a high rate of illiteracy and were breeding grounds for crime, so St. Gaetano opened an evening school for children who had to work at home or on the farm during the day.

Later transferred to a large parish in the provincial capital, the priest revived eucharistic and Marian devotions and promoted devotion to the Holy Face. He organized other priests to conduct missions with him in the city's parishes, to hear confessions for hours at a time and to minister to people who had been the victims of organized crime.

The future saint opened a makeshift orphanage in 1943 and — with the help of donations from Calabrian immigrants in the United States — opened a new facility in 1948. The building now houses a residence for the elderly.

As he grew ill and became blind, St. Gaetano lived in a small room at the Veronican Sisters' headquarters, welcoming visitors, listening to their troubles and hearing their confessions.

He died at the age of 84 and was beatified in 1997 by Pope John Paul II.

volunteering with the Society of St. Vincent de Paul.

Preparing couples for marriage, planning the liturgy, keeping track of finances, running classes for converts and performing all types of pastoral ministry such as sick calls were strictly the job of "Father."

Major functions not handled by priests — teaching at the parish school, religion classes and other education-related roles — were the responsibility of "Sister."

The post-Vatican II shift toward lay people being in charge of most of those functions started slowly but in the last few years has expanded dramatically.

Father Eugene Lauer, director of the National Pastoral Life Center in New York, said it was not until the early 1990s that it became common for parishes to employ lay people for roles traditionally held by priests, but now laity in those jobs outnumber priests in parish ministry.

He said about 31,000 lay people work in professional pastoral capacities at two-thirds of U.S. parishes. That figure does not include teachers and administrators at Catholic schools, and parish support staff such as secretaries, janitors and bookkeepers. Father Lauer said about 28,000 priests work primarily in parishes.

"That's a dramatic change from 15 or 20 years ago," he told Catholic News Service.

As recently as 1990, there were only 22,000 lay people working as liturgists, youth ministers, social concerns directors, adult education coordinators or in other professional pastoral positions. Before Vatican II, less than 1 percent of such jobs nationwide would have been filled by lay people, Father Lauer said.

"It was almost an unknown

'In some parishes and dioceses, there's a great deal of laity involvement.'

phenomenon," he said.

Decreasing religious

Nuns and religious brothers technically are also defined as laity, but their numbers since Vatican II are even more dramatically reduced than the number of priests.

A study for the National Pastoral Life Center published in the most recent issue of Church magazine showed that since 1990 the number of women religious in parish ministry has declined from 41 percent to 16 percent.

According to the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate at Georgetown University, since 1965 the number of religious women in the United States has dropped from 180,000 to 69,000. The number of religious brothers has decreased from 12,000 to about 5,000. The total of 59,000 priests in the country in 1965 has dropped to about 43,000.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Catholic population has grown from 46 million in 17,700 parishes to 68 million in 18,900 parishes.

Filling parish needs

Lay people now make pastoral visits to the sick; they plan liturgies, run the music groups, schedule the lectors and extraordinary ministers of holy Communion — who also are lay people — and run education programs for adults, engaged couples and children who attend public schools.

Father James Solari, pastor of St. Michael Church in Gastonia, discusses issues with his parish pastoral council Nov. 15. In recent years, more parishes are hiring and relying on lay people for parish ministry and to help with other church duties once held by priests and religious.

William D'Antonio, visiting professor at the Lifecycle Institute at The Catholic University of America in Washington, said although the documents of Vatican II opened the door to lay involvement in nearly all areas of parish ministry, those changes haven't been adopted uniformly.

"In some parishes and dioceses, there's a great deal of laity involvement," D'Antonio said.

But in some places "there's still an awful lot of authority at the top that can prevent the people who make up the church 'at the bottom' from becoming involved," he said.

Father Lauer said larger parishes with more money are understandably more likely to have lay people as their pastoral staff, but there also are some regional differences that may relate to the number of available priests.

For instance, he said, parishes in the New York Archdiocese are less likely to have lay people in professional parish ministry than are parishes in the Archdiocese of Chicago. But for various reasons, such as the number of large church organizations and colleges there, New York has a higher ratio of priests who fill some of those staffing needs.

Parishes in the Midwest and the West, where large parishes are perhaps more common, are more likely than those in the East and South to have lay professional staff.

"It has a lot to do with whether parishes can afford them," he said.

More parish minister roles filled by women

Serious involvement

Forty-one percent of lay parish ministers have master's degrees in their areas of work, the pastoral life center study found. Salaries average about $38,000 a year. While that might seem to be on the low side for people with graduate degrees, Father Lauer said the study found two-thirds of parish ministers consider their salaries adequate.

With women making up 80 percent of parish lay staff, that job is often a second family income, he noted, making a market-rate salary less important for many people.

More telling is that more than 85 percent of parish lay ministers describe their work as meaningful and satisfying, Father Lauer said. And more than 95 percent said they see themselves working in the church indefinitely or at least for the next few years.

Not only are lay people more involved in ministry at parishes, the people in the pews see a strong role for the laity in their church and they are prepared to run parishes with fewer priests.

A recent survey conducted by the Lifecycle Institute for the National Catholic Reporter found 89 percent of U.S. Catholics say the laity should have the right to participate in decisions about how parish income is spent. Seventy-two percent of those surveyed said lay Catholics should be able to participate in choosing priests for their parishes.

Eighty-three percent said they should be included in decisions about when parishes must be closed.

As the number of priests ministering to U.S. Catholics decreases, a majority of those polled for the Lifecycle Institute said they would find it at least somewhat acceptable to bring in priests from other countries or to share priests with other parishes.

Among other options a majority of people said they found somewhat or very acceptable are having a lay parish administrator and visiting priests; merging nearby parishes into one; and sometimes having a Communion service instead of Mass.

Majorities said they would not be willing to accept having Mass less often than once a week or closing their parish altogether.

Pope says text on divine revelation one of mainstays of Vatican II

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI praised the Second Vatican Council's document on divine revelation, a text he helped draft, as being "one of the supporting columns" of the council's entire work.

The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, "Dei Verbum," was approved by the council Nov. 18, 1965.

"This document dealt with revelation and its transmission, with the inspiration and interpretation of sacred Scripture and with its fundamental importance in the life of the church," the pope said Nov. 6 during his midday Angelus address.

As a young theologian and expert at the council, the then-Father Joseph Ratzinger worked closely with the document's drafters, particularly in explaining how Scripture and tradition relate to each other and how they relate to the magisterium, the church's teaching authority.

The pope told visitors in St. Peter's Square that God's revelation, brought to completion in Jesus Christ, was entrusted to the church so that it would be handed on intact to future generations.

God's revelation, he said, is contained in the Old and New Testaments and in the tradition of the church; a "progressive understanding" of that revelation continues "in the church with the assistance of the Holy Spirit."

The magisterium guarantees an authentic understanding of revelation, he said.

The council's document affirmed that the church is guided by the Gospel and it led to a rediscovery of the importance of the Scriptures in the life of every Christian, he said.

The impact of the document, the pope said, can be seen especially in post-Vatican II preaching, religious education, theology, spirituality and ecumenical relations.

"Among the many fruits of this biblical springtime, I would like to mention the spread of the ancient practice of 'lectio divina,' or 'spiritual reading' of the sacred Scriptures," he said.

With a mind and heart open to the promptings of the Holy Spirit, those who practice spiritual reading select a Bible passage, read it several times and give themselves time to meditate on it, the pope said.

Pope Benedict prayed that like the Blessed Virgin Mary, the church would be a humble servant of God's word "and proclaim it always with firm trust so that 'by hearing the message of salvation the whole world may believe, by believing it may hope, and by hoping it may love.'"

ARE YOU BEING CALLED TO THE HARVEST?

Then he said to His disciples, "The harvest is abundant but the laborers are few; so ask the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers for His harvest." (Mt 9:37)

I am praying that you will join me in responding to our Lord's request for more "laborers" in harvesting the abundant fruit to be found at Belmont Abbey College. Over 125 years ago the Benedictine Monks came south in response to God's call to begin His work in the vineyard of North Carolina.

He is calling you to place your hands upon the same bricks that were formed and put in place by these holy monks so long ago. I am looking for strong, dedicated, Catholic students to help realize our vision of excellence and virtue. Belmont Abbey is your Catholic College and God is calling you to the "harvest."

Hands-on guide offers help in planning Catholic funerals

BY JEAN M. SCHILDZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ST. LOUIS — "A Catholic Funeral," published this fall by Liguori Publications, is an informative, practical guide that can help people plan a funeral that will make the church and the family and friends of the deceased proud.

The 64-page booklet was penned by longtime St. Louis Post-Dispatch reporter and author Patricia Rice and edited by Paul Pennick, former managing editor of the St. Louis Review, newspaper of the St. Louis Archdiocese.

"A Catholic Funeral" was culled from a much broader work on Catholic funerals Rice wrote that Liguori has yet to publish. Rice conducted hundreds of interviews with clergy and laity across the country to collect material for the book and hands-on guide.

The material also reflects Rice's years as a journalist who has covered funerals large and small of all faiths.

Her own experiences with making funeral preparations for loved ones also helped shape what she wrote, said Rice in an interview with the Review.

"I have seen that the funeral can be the beginning of real healing and real strength and belief in the Resurrection," she said.

Rice noted that Catholics, in particular, "do beautiful funerals. It's all there for us to use; it's just a shame when they aren't perfectly wonderful."

The short chapters in "A Catholic Funeral" examine immediate concerns: finding a priest, helping with the homily, choosing a funeral home or alternative, the funeral vigil, Scripture readings, sacred music, prayer petitions, lay participants, cortege, burial and committal service, funeral notices and obituaries, tributes and planning ahead.

The workbook also contains an appendix with worksheets that outline a step-by-step process for planning in advance and at the time of death.

The material can be read quickly, so it enables those who may have only a limited time to plan to still make appropriate decisions.

The guide, said Rice, helps individuals reflect on their mortality, "to realize the finality of life and what really is important to you."

It also may help the dying to talk with their caregivers more freely about their impending death, express their final wishes, if desired, and talk about other issues they may have on their minds, Rice said.

The booklet suggests families planning a loved one's funeral gather together for a few hours, if at all possible, to select meaningful Scriptures, music and prayer petitions. It also identifies the many areas where family members can take part in a funeral Mass.

Examples include serving as a reader or pallbearer or being in the offertory procession.

It gives those who are dying and others who are planning their funerals in advance an opportunity to choose details that are important to them.

People Rice interviewed "were so grateful ... that they had something — a beautiful reading, even if they only knew a favorite hymn — that they could make this funeral really have some reflection on the life" of the deceased.

Most clergy told her they also "were thrilled when family has something to say" about funeral arrangements.

The booklet reminds readers that "a Catholic funeral Mass is about sending off our loved one to God, the journey all Christians prepare for all their lives."

Poem penned by U.S. Founding Father discovered in English school

LONDON (CNS) — A poem written by one of the U.S. Founding Fathers has been discovered in the archives of a Catholic high school in England.

Charles Carroll of Carrollton, one of the signers of the 1776 Declaration of Independence, wrote the poem in Latin in 1754 when he was a student in his final year of high school in Saint-Omer, France.

It was found in the archives of Stonyhurst College in Clitheroe, England.

"This is a significant discovery," said Jan Graffius, curator of the school's collections. "This previously unknown composition is bound to be of immense interest to American scholars."

The poem was composed to be read to an unnamed visiting dignitary to the Jesuit high school in Saint-Omer, and it bears Carroll's signature.

It is being translated by a group of seven 17- and 18-year-old Latin students at Stonyhurst and their classics teacher.

Jonathan Hewat, Stonyhurst spokesman, said the final translation of the poem was expected by Christmas, and that Carroll had "recreated in poetic form" the martyrdom of St. Cecilia, patron saint of music.

The poem, he said, includes a dialogue between St. Cecilia and Almachius, the Roman prefect who ordered her to repudiate her faith.

Hewat said the poem ends with St. Cecilia proclaiming that she is willing to die for her beliefs.

Whitehead also discovered in the Stonyhurst archives a book he believed was defaced by Carroll in 1751. He also scrawled his signature on the first page.

Advent a reminder of whose child we are

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Song lyrics always have had the ability to lodge in my brain — especially the ones that connect life experience and religious truth. Back in my high school years when "Jesus Music" was in its pioneer days, I would crank up my albums and cassette tapes and sing along with oft-repeated favorites like this one:

So remember that you're one of the children

You have a name wherever you are
Please remember, just remember
Remember whose child you are.

("After the Flood, Before the Fire," Steve and Annie Chapman, Lion and Lamb Records, 1975)

That catchy refrain so captivated me that to this day when I drop my 16-year-old son at school or send him off to a party I remind him playfully, "Remember whose child you are!"

Of course, I've already made him aware of that phrase's double meaning. Despite the equally playful, eye-rolling response I usually get, his father and I hope that the values we have taught him throughout his childhood will bear fruit.

More important, it's a reminder that on Oct. 1, 1989, this now lanky young man was claimed for Christ at his baptism and that as God's child he has certain privileges and obligations.

In a curious twist, the readings for this first Sunday of Advent begin with a plea from Israel for the Lord to "remember whose Father he is" (my paraphrase). The implication, so indicative of the Advent season, is that by reminding God of his special relationship with us, we remind ourselves as well.

The remembrance of this relationship, with its attendant privileges and responsibilities, takes on a tone of urgency in the Gospel. Jesus' parable of the servants who allow themselves to fall asleep during their master's absence is a not-so-subtle warning against the complacency that allows us to think and act as if we are unaccountable to anyone but ourselves.

Sooner or later, in one form or another, the wakeup call comes; the master comes home, and we remember that our privileged position in God's household, our fellowship with Jesus Christ, has profound implications for every aspect of our lives.

As a time of preparation for the Christmas season and the coming of the Lord, who became one of us, Advent brings many messages of hope, expectation and even joy. It also presents a challenge to each and every one to "remember whose child you are."

ABC film focuses on pontiff's 'human point of view,' says producer

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — An upcoming ABC movie on the life of Pope John Paul II is going to focus on the "human point of view" of the pontiff, setting it apart from a competing movie about the pope planned by CBS, according to Italian television veteran Lorenzo Minoli, producer of ABC's film.

"Have No Fear: The Life of Pope John Paul II" will air 8-10 p.m. EST Thursday, Dec. 1, on ABC, which announced its air date after CBS had committed to Dec. 4 and 7 as the dates for its own two-night papal miniseries.

Six years ago in Hollywood, CBS president Les Moonves uttered a now-classic line of hubris about CBS' and NBC's separate TV-movie projects, at that time about the life of Christ.

"Our Jesus is better than their Jesus," he said.

The CBS version was produced by Minoli. Now that his deal this time is with ABC, would Minoli dare say that "our pope is better than their pope"?

The short answer: No.

"There is nothing good in bashing others. I think that one thing I'm sure of is that our movie's different from theirs," Minoli told Catholic News Service in a telephone interview from New York, where he was seeing the completed project for the first time.

"I don't want to say my movie is better than the other movie. I want to say my movie's different. The reason is the point of view, the human point of view of this incredible man," Minoli said.

Thomas Kretschmann stars in a scene from the movie "Have No Fear: The Life of Pope John Paul II," which will air 8-10 p.m. EST Thursday, Dec. 1, on ABC. Producer Lorenzo Minoli says the film focuses on the pontiff's "human point of view."

"We focused on some of what I believe are the essential messages that he gave us," he added. "This pope, very much, had no fear."

Throughout "Have No Fear," the pope (Thomas Kretschmann) shows courage and resolve not only as pontiff, but as a cardinal, bishop, priest and student in his native Poland.

In the film a scene of Pope John Paul skirmishing with Polish communists is shown prior to file footage of the Berlin Wall coming down, signaling an end to the communist domination of Eastern Europe. But the pope also expresses his disappointment to Poland's bishops about the heightened materialism and lowered moral values of his homeland after communism.

Minoli said he wanted the audience to understand that "the pope got rid of the communists" but also to have them see that not everything was fine, Minoli said. "He was speaking against ... the material world. And I think that was very important to him."

"Have No Fear" also dramatizes the pope's last public appearance March 30 when he made a surprise appearance at his studio window to bless thousands of pilgrims gathered below in St. Peter's Square. It shows Pope John Paul trying to speak to the crowd using a microphone, but the few syllables he uttered were incomprehensible. He died April 2.

Minoli said the pope was trying to say at that point, "Have no fear of your being frail, of your weaknesses and of dying," and he was showing that to young witnesses. I think it was an incredible message."

"Have No Fear" has already been sold to TV networks in 40 countries, Minoli said, but the U.S. audience will be the first to see it.

Being up against the top-rated "Survivor" does not bother Minoli in the slightest.

"Listen, when we had 'Jesus,' we were prime time. We were against a show that nobody could beat ... 'Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?', and both nights we beat the 'Millionaire,'" he said.

"Now we're against a titan here, and I put my fate in the hands of God. What can I do? And I really believe that this movie is very powerful, a very strong movie and it deserves to be seen," he said.

But if it has to be described as a network competition, then to Minoli it's a friendly competition.

"I have to say I am very pleased that at the end of the day we have competition between two Italian companies, basically, about the pope, and we have two movies about the pope for the American audience," he said.

"The pope will be very happy to know that we are bombarding the American audience with movies about his life. And there is a third movie coming out about him. This is the ultimate success," he said.

The third movie Minoli mentioned, "A Man Who Became Pope," aired in August on the Hallmark Channel. The made-for-TV film may get a Golden Globe nomination.

Bishops call for abolition of death penalty statement by the bishops that called for the abolition of capital punishment.

As Bishop Nicholas DiMarzio of Brooklyn, N.Y., chairman of the Committee on Domestic Policy, explained as he presented it for a vote, "While this statement represents a major step forward for us as a body of bishops, it does not represent new teaching."

Instead, it uses recent teaching included in the "Catechism of the Catholic Church," the Social Doctrine Compendium and Pope John Paul II's encyclical, "Evangelium Vitae" ("The Gospel of Life"), to express the bishops' commitment to "restrict, restrain and bring an end to the use of this ultimate penalty because it is deeply flawed and often unfair, and because we have other, better ways to protect society which are more respectful of human life and dignity," he said.

Bishop DiMarzio said the death penalty "arouses deep passions and diverse views," and that the church's teachings on it "can be oversimplified, misused or ignored."

He noted that the new statement is the product of three different committees and staff offices and incorporates the perspectives of the bishops' pro-life, doctrine and domestic policy committees.

He noted that during a workshop two days before, bishops heard from people with personal experience of the death penalty — the survivor of murder victims, the brother of a convicted killer and someone wrongfully sentenced to death. Those people "turned their loss and suffering into a compelling witness for life, all life," Bishop DiMarzio said.

Similar stories can be heard around the country, in families "for whom violent crime and the death penalty are not issues or causes, but sources of deep pain and heartbreak," he continued. "We must reach out to them, to support and comfort, to care and stand with them. The death penalty offers a false path to healing and wholeness."

The statement opens by referencing the bishops' 1980 statement and saying they are renewing their call to end the death penalty now "to seize a new moment and new momentum."

The United States should stop using the death penalty for four reasons, it says:

— Other ways exist to punish criminals and protect society.

— The application of capital punishment is "deeply flawed and can be irreversibly wrong, is prone to errors and is biased by factors such as race, the quality of legal representation and where the crime was committed."

— State-sanctioned killing diminishes all people.

— The penalty of execution undermines respect for human life and dignity.

"We renew our common conviction that it is time for our nation to abandon the illusion that we can protect life by taking life," it says. "We encourage reflection and call for common action in the Catholic community and among all men and women of good will to end the use of the death penalty in our land. Ending the death penalty would be one important step away from a culture of death toward building a culture of life."

"While we do not equate the situation of (people) convicted of terrible crimes with the moral claims of innocent unborn children or the vulnerable elderly and the disabled, we are convinced that working together to end the use of the death penalty is an integral and important part of resisting the culture of death and building a true culture of life," it says.

The statement makes note of a shift over the last 25 years to growing public distrust for how the death penalty is applied and decreasing support for its use. It also said the goal of the statement is "not just to proclaim a position, but to persuade Catholics and others to join us in working to end the use of the death penalty."

The saints came marching in Third-graders dress as, admire saints

CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — In his homily, Father John Schneider, pastor of St. Eugene Church in Asheville, said that the feast of All Saints was “really a fun day.”

It was exactly that for the students of Asheville Catholic School.

The third-graders dressed as their favorite saints for an all-school assembly in the gymnasium, followed by Mass at St. Eugene Church on the feast of All Saints Nov. 1.

After processing into the gym to “When the Saints Go Marching In,” each third-grader described the saint he or she represented. Fellow students had three guesses to identify the saint. St. Agatha, St. Gregory and St. Barnabas were a few of the saints that stumped the audience.

“I really liked my saint. It was fun to dress like her. She had a funny hat,” said Alexis Womble, who dressed like St. Catherine Laboure. “She was a nun and cared for the poor for 40 years.”

Third-grade teacher Donna Smith said her students researched and wrote essays about their chosen saints during the summer. Recently, they shortened their essays and rehearsed for the presentations.

The third-graders had a variety of reasons for choosing and admiring their saints.

Sika Lemauviel, who dressed as St. Barbara, said her saint, the patron of firefighters and protection from bombs and lightning, was beheaded because she converted to Christianity.

As part of her costume, Ashley Bruce wore a crown with candles to represent St. Lucy.

Father John Schneider, pastor of St. Eugene Church, looks on as third-graders from Asheville Catholic School come for Mass dressed as saints on All Saints Day Nov. 1.

“She had a hard life. She wanted to be God’s bride,” said Ashley, but said the saint’s eyesight was taken by a prospective husband. “But God gave her back her eyesight.”

As St. Barnabas, Dylan Tinbal said he liked the fact that his saint was a good friend of St. Paul. Christopher Knollman was impressed that his saint, St. Francis de Sales, escaped being eaten by wolves by climbing a tree.

Father Schneider told the students they were a part of the communion of saints, and urged them to “work on being holy people so that you may one day be part of that number in heaven.”

The feast of All Saints was instituted to honor all the saints known and unknown and, according to Pope Urban IV, to supply any deficiencies in the faithful’s celebration of saints’ feasts during the year.

It was Pope Gregory IV who, in 835, ordered the feast of All Saints to be universally observed on Nov. 1.

What a theologian is

Q. What is a theologian? Is it just someone who has a degree in theology? Or is it a special designation? I've heard people speak of this theology or that. I thought there was only one genuine and orthodox theology in the church. The rest are wrong. (New York)

A. To begin with, I think you are confusing theology with dogma or doctrine. Dogmas are the official teachings of the church about our faith: Jesus is God and human, there are seven sacraments and so on. Theology is something else entirely.

At its base, theology is a discourse or study about God. More specifically it is an organized system of thought that attempts to synthesize the doctrines we have received from reason or revelation to see how they fit together and how they mesh with other aspects and experiences of human life.

As an ancient saying puts it, theology is "fides quaerens intellectum," faith seeking understanding.

Theologies may focus on any area of Christian belief and activity — doctrine, moral behavior, Scripture, bioethics, history and development of doctrines, to mention only a few.

In that sense there are many respectable and acceptable theologies in the Catholic tradition. St. Augustine evolved a theology, still widely accepted, with which later theologians, like St. Thomas Aquinas, often disagreed.

A good illustration is the theology handed down by St. Paul.

At the risk of oversimplifying a bit, the focus of his theology was the resurrection of our Lord. It was this event, he often said, which bestowed the saving power of the Lord Jesus (Rom 1:4), which bestows the promise of resurrection on Christian believers and which made everything else hang together.

Some later schools of theology identified the key Christian event as the incarnation itself rather than the resurrection.

Such differences may appear academic, but they have immense consequences on how we understand and live our life in Jesus Christ.

To answer your question more directly, theologians are simply knowledgeable experts in these specialized sciences. Through the centuries the church, all of us, including bishops and popes, have depended heavily on competent theologians like Sts. Gregory of Nyssa, Irenaeus, Jerome, Ambrose, Robert Bellarmine, Teresa of Avila, Alphonsus Liguori and hundreds of other great and lesser lights.

Perhaps because good theologians are often at the cutting edge of Catholic thinking and exploration, many, perhaps even most of them, were at some time "prophets without honor" in the church.

Interestingly, through the centuries more than a few theologians who were at one time condemned or refused permission to teach were later recognized as saying something extremely valuable that the church needed to hear. St. Thomas Aquinas himself and several major theologians of the 20th century are good examples.

As with mothers, fathers, priests, physicians and attorneys, there are capable and less capable theologians. They may be right or wrong or in between. But, unlike revealed doctrines which are accepted by faith, theologians' theories and opinions, which deserve to be studied carefully, are as good or bad as their reasons for them.

Another characteristic of truly authentic theologians in the church is that they are perceived by ordinary people as being in touch with real lives of real men and women. Theories, no matter how learned, which the majority of good Christian believers cannot personally relate to, never have a lasting impact on the church.

Theology, and theologians, in other words, are at the service of the church, both the hierarchy and the laity. As history has proven (a vast number of the most illustrious Catholic theologians have been saints), however awesome their learning, they need to have the Catholic faith in their blood and live it with their lives.

The effectiveness of their service in forming and enriching the spirituality, hope and faith of Christians is an indispensable criterion of "good" and authentic theologians.

A wakeup call to the laity

People needed to speak, act for truth

Forty years ago the ordained leaders of the Catholic Church empowered the laity as at no other time in recent history. In their Nov. 18, 1965, document "Decree on the Apostolate of Lay People," the world's bishops at Vatican Council II proclaimed and promoted the essential role of the laity in the church and world.

In that decree they wrote, "From the fact of their union with Christ the head flows the laymen's right and duty to be apostles. Inserted as they are in the mystical body of Christ by baptism and strengthened by the power of the Holy Spirit in confirmation, it is by the Lord himself that they are assigned to the apostolate."

God himself is calling each of us to advance his kingdom of justice, peace and love. It is much like the building of a great cathedral. Although architects and engineers are needed to guide the construction, without masons, carpenters, roofers, glassworkers and laborers, it would never rise.

The council fathers said that the laity, "working in harmony, should renew the temporal order and make it increasingly more perfect: Such is God's design for the world. ... At a time when new questions are being put and when grave errors aiming at undermining religion ... are rampant ... the council earnestly exhorts the laity to take a more active part ... in the explanation and defense of Christian principles and in the correct application of them to the problems of our time."

Grave errors are indeed rampant in contemporary society. And we are far from that more perfect order envisioned by God and the council fathers. Abortion, human embryonic stem-cell research, in vitro fertilization and cloning destroy human life at its earliest stages.

Making a Difference

TONY MAGLIANO

Poverty, hunger, contaminated water, preventable diseases, homelessness, illiteracy, unemployment and underemployment sadly illustrate the unjust and growing gap between rich and poor.

The sacred institution of marriage is powerfully assaulted by increasing acceptance of same-sex "marriages," cohabitation and violence, and many corporations in the United States selfishly cut jobs, benefits and pensions to maximize profit.

Corporate greed continues heartlessly to abuse sweatshop employees in the developing world. And with no end in sight, war and the arms trade are tightening their stranglehold on humanity.

Today, more than ever, the church and world need a highly motivated laity, deeply committed to bringing the transforming power of the Gospel to all spheres of society. Cardinal John Henry Newman, the great 19th-century church leader, wrote that during the fourth century, when belief in the divinity of Jesus was denied by many bishops, it was largely the faith of the laity that protected this central doctrine.

Like our ancient Catholic ancestors, we need to speak courageously and act on behalf of the truth — the truth that will set us free. It is time to wake up. Jesus is calling us to be the light of the world!

The what and who of Thanksgiving

There is always someone to thank for our blessings

Here comes another Thanksgiving, when the Christmas shopping has begun and the turkeys run for their lives. Except the turkeys, we all rejoice in celebrating Thanksgiving.

I like this holiday, so distinctively American and so symbolic with positive and spiritual attitude toward God. Gratitude, after all, depends not upon physical or material well-being, but on something bigger and deeper.

If Thanksgiving were simply good food and good cheer, then our first Thanksgiving should have had its origin in the Jamestown Colony of Virginia, which enjoyed marked comfort and prosperity, rather than in Plymouth Colony in New England, where hardships, misery and destitution were commonplace.

When our Pilgrim fathers instituted this anniversary, it was no holiday for them. They were separated from home, family and friends by the breadth of the ocean. They didn't enjoy abundant harvests nor peace, prosperity or wealth for which to give thanks. A bleak prospect confronted them and foes surrounded them.

For what and for whom, then, did they give thanks?

They thanked God for God, not for "things." They were thankful, not for the misery and starvation, but for the hope that wealth and food would come, as it did.

I understand that for some, Thanksgiving is not a holiday, but a hollow day. Our faith, however, teaches us that light always follows the darkness, and the tunnel will eventually end; so we are thankful for what's coming.

There is a huge difference between the superficial Thanksgiving and the sacrificial Thanksgiving. It is easy to hold a Thanksgiving service. It is much more difficult to translate thanksgiving into life.

The Bible gives us three levels of thanksgiving. The first level is found in Lk.18:11: "I give thanks, O God, that I am not like the other men."

You remember who said that: the Pharisee. Sometimes in our lives we may have been just like him or we may have met somebody just like him. He is the self-made man who is so very grateful for himself, his fame or his country. He uses God to congratulate and applaud his accomplishments.

There is a definite link between gratitude and self-glorification.

The second level is outlined in Philippians (1:3): "I thank my God every time I remember you." That's much better.

St. Paul had the humility to acknowledge the power of God in his friends living in Philippi. Remembrance is an important element of our thanksgiving.

We need to remember what the Pharisee forgot: most of the good things are not fruits of our skills and talents, but gifts of the infinite generosity of God as well as the skills and talents of other people.

Retrace your steps on this day: Perhaps you were awakened this morning by an alarm clock invented by a Swiss mechanic. Perhaps you crawled out from between sheets made of cotton by a Southern farmer.

Perhaps you washed your face in a porcelain bowl developed first in China. Perhaps you put on a suit made by a Jewish craftsman in New York, and a pair of shoes taken from the hide of a Texas steer.

Perhaps you went to work driving a car manufactured in Detroit or Singapore. You walked into the office building, built by hands you never saw.

Yes, indeed, I thank God every time I do something and acknowledge that many have prepared the path for me.

The third highest level is Jesus himself when He said: "I thank you, Father" (Jn.11:41). Someone said that the worst moment for an atheist comes when he wants to say "thank you" and has no one to whom to say it.

Jesus knew to whom and for what to give thanks. We sometimes forget or take for granted what is given to us every day. You never miss the water until the well is dry.

Capuchin Franciscan Father John Aurilia is pastor of Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville.

Being Christian means thanking God for great gifts, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Humans often find it easier to remember the bad things that have happened to them, rather than the good that God has done, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Commenting Nov. 16 on the hymn of thanksgiving in Psalm 136, the pope said being Christian means being thankful for the great gifts of God, especially the gift of his Son, Jesus Christ.

In moving from praising God for the gifts of creation to praising God for his efforts throughout history to protect and save his people, the psalm "wants to turn our attention to the greater gift of eternal life with God," the pope said.

In listing the ways God has been present in history, the psalm focuses on God leading Israel out of slavery in Egypt, through the desert and to the Promised Land, the pope said.

Christians "add something the psalmist did not know, but something he was awaiting — the true gift God gave us, the gift of his Son, the gift of the incarnation in which God made himself our gift and remains with us in the Eucharist and in his word every day until the end of history," the pope said.

"One of the dangers we face as human beings is that our memory of the evil we have suffered is often stronger than our memory of goodness," he said. "The psalm helps reawaken in us the memory of goodness, of the great good God has done and continues to do for us, which we can see if our heart is attentive to it."

Pope Benedict said the psalm "wants to reawaken in us an awareness of the good so that we can finally know the truth of what the psalm says with joy, 'The mercy of the Lord endures forever and is present each day.'"

At the end of the audience, the pope offered special greetings to members of the Italian pro-life movement, which was sponsoring a national meeting of centers that help pregnant women facing emotional or financial difficulties.

The pope thanked the movement for its "courageous activity" in defending the right to life of every human from the moment of conception.

After the audience, Pope Benedict went to Vatican City State's central office to receive a gift from DaimlerChrysler Italia — a shiny red Mercedes-Benz Econic truck, which the carmaker outfitted as a firetruck.

The manufacturer said the truck, the only one of its kind, was made especially for fighting fires in Vatican City's tall buildings and narrow roads.

Rosa Parks lives on

One person can make historic changes

As I was leaving the National Gallery of Art on a clear, warm fall evening, I did a double-take at the unending line that had formed in front of and around the U.S. Capitol. People literally were pouring onto the Capitol grounds from everywhere to pay their last respects to Rosa Parks, lying in state in the Capitol Rotunda.

In a hushed atmosphere, people of all ages and races waited patiently in lines that slowly snaked up to the entrance of the Capitol. What made this so awesome is that it was rather a spur-of-the-moment tribute; little notification had been given.

Many parents brought young children with them to experience this historical moment, making it an unforgettable evening. A sense of greatness was in the air.

Above everything else, greatness stands for a person's willingness to stick up for what is important. Great people have great vision, make bold decisions, involve themselves deeply in events and are original, creative.

In Rosa Parks, we were blessed with a bold woman willing to stay seated on a bus and confront the Jim Crow law that reduced African Americans to second-class status. Her breadth of vision and courage were her weapons of choice and helped to restore to African Americans their rightful first-class status.

Many despised that law and mumbled under their breath against it. Rosa Parks, on the other hand, immersed herself in it. And what more creative and original way to change history than aboard a bus in which people travel together toward a destination?

Today we applaud her courage for doing the right thing. But 50 years ago in Montgomery, Ala., this act of courage was anything but applauded and easily could have led to her death.

As all inspiring actions do, the influence of hers spread, especially to a young 26-year-old Martin Luther King Jr., whose championing of African-American freedom led to his martyrdom.

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE
HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

As Rosa Parks lay in state in the Capitol Rotunda, there was a sense there that the moment was historic. Here was the first woman ever to be so honored in the U.S. Capitol. Not only does this woman stand for the rights of African Americans and all citizens deemed by others to be second-class, but for the rights of women as well.

During the prayer service, a priest and two ministers prayed for Rosa Parks and the cause she represented. In an age when anything smacking of God is considered virtually unconstitutional, prayers rang out and a Gospel choir sang before a large portrait of the signers of the Constitution. All in attendance bowed their heads.

History is filled with many great individuals. Surely, Rosa Parks is one of them. God singled her out to stand up boldly for one of the noble races he created.

The Losing family of Oxbow, N.D., and their relatives, neighbors, co-workers and friends built this playground in memory of Nadia Losing, who died of SIDS, or sudden infant death syndrome, only four-and-a-half weeks after she was born on May 1, 2003. Nadia's family members (from left) are Noah, 3, Naomi, 7, Nathaniel, 9, and her parents, Michelle and Steve.

Playground memorializes Catholic couple's baby who died of SIDS

BY TANYA WATTERUD
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

OXBOW, N.D. — Each time the Losing children, ages 9, 7 and 3, climb the playground equipment in their neighborhood park in Oxbow, they feel a little closer to their sister, Nadia.

The Losing family and their relatives, neighbors, co-workers and friends built the playground in 2004 in memory of Nadia, who died of SIDS, or sudden infant death syndrome, only four-and-a-half weeks after she was born May 1, 2003.

To deal with the shock of her death, Nadia's parents, Michelle and Steve Losing, turned to their Catholic faith.

"The first thing I reached for was the rosary ... to pray to give Michelle strength," Steve Losing said. "I leaned on my faith to try to get me through."

Michelle Losing found strength in Mary, the mother of Jesus. During Nadia's funeral, the casket was placed in front of a statue of Mary. Michelle Losing said she trusted that Mary would take care of her little girl. Her comfort came through prayer "and knowing that she would be taken care of up there and be so happy."

The idea of building a playground had actually surfaced a few days before Nadia's death, when at a gathering residents discussed adding one to their neighborhood. After Nadia's death, the Losings decided building it might be one way to create a memorial for their child.

Since "Nadia" means "hope," they decided to call their project "Nadia's Hope."

The Losings did not realize it, but at the same time their neighbors, Kim and Chris Holland, were already talking to others about making donations toward a playground in Nadia's memory. The Hollands pledged to match whatever was raised.

Within four weeks, the Losings' neighbors, co-workers, family members and friends had donated nearly $11,000.

After seeing information on the Internet about matching-grant programs for playground equipment, Steve Losing sent North Dakota Gov. John Hoeven an e-mail inquiring whether their state had such a program. The Parks and Recreation office responded, telling him federal grants were available. Steve Losing applied and his grant request was approved. Within eight months time, the Nadia's Hope project had received $50,000.

On Father's Day weekend in June 2004, more than 50 people gathered to construct the playground. At the top of one of the structures are the words "Nadia's Hope."

Seventy percent of those who die of SIDS are between the ages of two weeks and four months.

SIDS deaths occur most frequently among the Native American population, followed by African-Americans, Mexican-Americans and Caucasians. More boys than girls die of SIDS. There are a number of other risk factors, including premature birth or low birth weights, but age was the only risk factor for Nadia.

The day Nadia died, June 3, 2003, her father was out of town on business. Michelle Losing had given Nadia a bath, then laid her down on her back for a nap. When she checked on her baby a short time later, at about 11 a.m., the baby was in a different position.

"She was contorted in a way," Michelle Losing recalled. "When I picked her up, she was completely lifeless."

She called an ambulance and then started cardiopulmonary resuscitation. At the hospital, medical personnel used a ventilator to keep Nadia breathing until Father Dan Pilon, the Losings' pastor, arrived to baptize her. It was a Tuesday. Her baptism was to have been held the following Sunday at St. Benedict Church in Wild Rice.

Efforts to resuscitate Nadia were stopped and the doctor said he would consider her death a SIDS case.

After Michelle Losing called her husband, he was able to get a flight home right away and was back in Fargo by 3 p.m.

Michelle Losing had hoped they would find a more definite cause for Nadia's death. "You're just looking for something to say, 'This was the reason why,'" she said. With SIDS, however, there is no easy explanation. "Nobody has the answers."

Steve Losing said he and his wife have learned a lot about how to express sympathy to others. "I think the best thing to say sometimes is 'I'm so sorry for your loss.'"

Michelle Losing added, "Sometimes the power of a hug from a friend is way better than any words."

A fire in the mountains

Participants reflect on community, conversion at annual retreat

LAKE JUNALUSKA — Community, contemplation and conversion were among the themes at the 12th annual Fire in the Mountains.

The one-day retreat, sponsored by the Diocese of Charlotte's Asheville and Smoky Mountain vicariates and Office of Faith Formation, took place Nov. 12. Nearly 200 people attended from parishes around the diocese.

In his English-language talk, "Nurturing the Seed God Sowed," Conventual Franciscan Father Linus DeSantis said Catholics cultivate God's seed in liturgical and family rituals and in "customs and practices which speak of relationships, bond, connection," with individuals and community.

Father DeSantis, campus minister at Kennesaw State University and Berry College in Georgia, said people should

John Jay College chosen to do major clergy sex abuse study

BY AGOSTONI BONO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The U.S. bishops' National Review Board selected the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York to conduct a major study of the causes and context of clergy child sex abuse.

The announcement was made Nov. 16 by Patricia O'Donnell Ewers, board chairwoman, during a meeting with the U.S. bishops in Washington for their annual fall meeting. The aim of the study is to better help church leaders understand the problem and improve prevention measures.

The $3 million study was called for in the 2002 "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People" approved by the bishops. The charter contains church policies to

HEATING HEARTHS AND HEARTS

Parish-based wood bank in Vermont helps needy keep homes warm

BARNARD, Vt. (CNS) — Hearths and hearts will be warmed this winter thanks to volunteers at a parish-based wood bank who cut, split, stack and deliver wood to people who face the emergency situation of having no heat.

"It's community service," said Joe Sheperd, a volunteer for Upper Valley Wood Fuel Bank and a parishioner of Our Lady of the Snows Church in Woodstock. "It feels good to give back physically and not just write a check."

Many recipients use wood as a backup to heat their homes when their heating fuel is depleted. The wood bank is believed to be the only parish-based bank of its kind in Vermont.

Parishioner Nicholas Ferro is filling in as coordinator of the wood bank for his son, Bryan, who founded the wood bank in 1991 as a service project when he was a high school student.

Bryan Ferro was inspired by an article about an elderly couple who died of hypothermia because they could not afford to heat their home.

"The church got involved to help keep it going," said Nicholas Ferro. "Now it's pretty much all church," though there are a few nonparish volunteers who help with collecting, splitting, stacking and delivery.

Some students from nearby Dartmouth College in Hanover, N.H., help too.

Shepherd lives down the road from Ferro's house in Barnard, where the wood is stored in a shed built by parishioners. Shepherd often makes deliveries in his pickup truck to people at risk of being without heat; sometimes he delivers to those whose fuel has already run out.

Referrals come from individuals and agencies such as community action programs and social services.

"I had a call from a woman (who was running out of wood) with three kids whose husband left her, and she doesn't work," said Ferro. "They're really in trouble."

Shepherd said he would make the delivery over the weekend.

Father Thomas Mosher, pastor, said parishioners are aware of their neighbors' needs and willing to address them.

"People here are very responsive ... and very generous both locally and globally," said the pastor of the 360-family parish.

The wood bank, a Vermont domestic nonprofit organization, has served more than 250 families and delivered more than 250 cords of wood.

Wood for the wood bank is donated, sometimes by anonymous donors.

Some people give to the wood bank when they convert to other methods of heating.

Ferro said he expected there will be more requests for emergency wood supplies this winter because of the high price of heating fuel.

Bible, evolution are perfectly compatible, says Jesuit magazine

ROME (CNS) — Properly understood, the Bible and evolutionary science are perfectly compatible, said an influential Jesuit magazine.

To use religious arguments against evolution shows ignorance of the nature of the Bible, said La Civiltà Cattolica in its Nov. 19 issue.

On the other hand, science cannot pretend to exclude a divine role behind the creation of the world and man, it said.

The magazine's contents are reviewed by the Vatican's Secretariat of State, and its views are thought to reflect Vatican opinion.

The magazine said there is no opposition between the theory of evolution and the account of creation in Scripture, because "the Bible is a book that does not try to give a scientific teaching, but a religious teaching."

"It doesn't try to teach 'how' man appeared historically," it said. Instead, the Bible teaches who man is in relation to God and the world, what is man's spiritual condition, and what is man's destiny.

The article said that when it comes to creation scientists and believers should be careful not to invade each other's fields of competence.

Scientists should not presume to exclude God as the first cause of all creation and the creator of man, it said. Science cannot say that man was not created by God and is simply the result of chance.

When evolution is presented correctly, however, there is no contradiction with Scripture, it said.

"These are two visions of the origin of man that not only do not contradict each other but complete each other, on the condition that the scientist does not try to exclude any intervention of God in the formation of man and the believer does not try to find in science a confirmation of the biblical account," it said.

FROM THE VATICAN

Modern culture leaves people in state of adolescence, says pope

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Returning to a key theme of his pontificate, Pope Benedict XVI said modern culture tends to promote selfishness and self-centeredness, leaving people in a state of “prolonged adolescence.”

The pope made the remarks in a message to the annual joint session of the major pontifical academies, including the academies for sciences, social sciences, life, fine arts and archaeology.

The topic of the academies’ encounter was Christ as the “measure of true humanism.” The pope said it was a crucial theme for a modern culture marked by subjectivism, extreme individualism and relativism.

Today’s culture “pushes people to make themselves the ultimate measure” of things, he said. The individual ego has become “the only criterion to evaluate one’s reality and one’s choices.”

“In this way, man tends to increasingly withdraw upon himself and close himself in a suffocating existential microcosm, in which there is no place for the great ideals that are open to transcendence and to God,” the pope said.

All these cultural currents tend to leave people in a state of infancy or prolonged adolescence, he said. Men and women unable to understand themselves as creatures in relationship to a divine reality end up living in “the narrow enclosure of their own selfishness.”

He asked the pontifical academies to promote a “new humanism” based on Christ as a model of goodness, beauty and truth.

During their meeting, the academies awarded their annual prize, which went this year to Giovanni Catapano for his recent publication on philosophy in the early works of St. Augustine.

People have right to keep genetic status unknown, says geneticist

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Until science can cure genetic defects and illnesses, it must protect an individual’s right to keep his or her genetic status unknown, a geneticist told a Vatican conference.

The Nov. 17-19 conference on the human genome, sponsored by the Pontifical Council for Health Care Workers, featured top-level scientists and physicians who reported progress in the field of genetics and cautioned about the ethical problem of what to do with information when no cure is possible.

Giovanni Neri, professor of genetics at Rome’s Sacred Heart University, said counseling must be part of the process of sharing genetic test results with a patient.

“The recognition that there is a genetic disease running in the family will be perceived by the family as a stigma, a mark of imperfection,” he said. Counseling can ensure the family understands the real risks involved and can assist them in reaching “responsible reproductive decisions.”

Neri said that a basic, absolute requirement is that the tests are performed only on consenting adults.

“In this respect, special care must be taken to protect the right of not knowing one’s genetic status, especially when children are involved, and/or when there is no effective treatment for the disease that is being considered,” he said.

Dr. George Robert Fraser, an expert on genetic defects in children, told the conference that while great progress has been made on mapping the human genome and identifying anomalous genes “we are only at the beginning” of finding therapeutic uses for the information.

The physician acknowledged “a tendency to resort to abortion” when a fetus is diagnosed with a genetic malformation.

Fraser said that since the emphasis of medicine is on “the preservation of life,” he believes that, as the possibilities for cures increase, the resort to abortion will be seen as “a transient phase in the development of genetic medicine.”

The physician also said scientists and ethicists must work together to ensure that no one suffers discrimination based on his or her genetic code.

Eucharistic Congress

Dates set in 2006 for second diocesan event

BY DAVID HAINS

SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — Mark your calendars for the next Eucharistic Congress.

The 2006 Eucharistic Congress has been scheduled for Friday, Oct. 6, and Saturday, Oct. 7, at the Charlotte Convention Center.

The Eucharistic Congress brings together laity, clergy, religious men and women, and well-known speakers for a day and a half of worship and lectures related to the Eucharist, the source and summit of Catholic life.

The highlights of this Eucharistic Congress will include a eucharistic procession through uptown Charlotte and a vigil Mass celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis and concelebrated by priests of the diocese.

The first Eucharistic Congress, held this past September, drew a larger-than-expected crowd — an estimated 7,000 people attended all or some of the events Sept. 23-24. Evaluation forms turned in at the congress indicated overwhelming support for making the congress an annual event.

The 2005 congress used only a small portion of the Convention Center in Charlotte. The 2006 event will utilize more space to accommodate the gathering.

WANT MORE INFO?

Visit the Eucharistic Congress Web site, www.GoEucharist.com, throughout the year for updated information about the event and the speakers.

Scouts earn Eucharist patches

More than 2,500 scouts in 35 states participated in the Year of the Eucharist religious activity program initiated by the Diocese of Dodge City's Catholic Committee on Scouting earlier this year. The program, in which Scouts worked to earn the Year of the Eucharist patch, was initially started as a way for Scouts in the Kansas diocese to commemorate the church's Year of the Eucharist, observed from October 2004 until October 2005.

To earn the patch, Scouts in different age groups and adult leaders were required to complete specific religious activities.

"This just seemed to be a program that Scouts were ready to embrace," said Tim Wenzl, religious emblems coordinator. "The response is an obvious indication that there is a real hunger out there for religious activity programs of this type."

ARE YOU BEING CALLED TO THE HARVEST?

Then he said to His disciples, "The harvest is abundant but the laborers are few; so ask the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers for His harvest." (Mt 9:37)

I am praying that you will join me in responding to our Lord's request for more "laborers" in harvesting the abundant fruit to be found at Belmont Abbey College. Over 125 years ago the Benedictine Monks came south in response to God's call to begin His work in the vineyard of North Carolina.

He is calling you to place your hands upon the same bricks that were formed and put in place by these holy monks so long ago. I am looking for strong, dedicated, Catholic students to help realize our vision of excellence and virtue. Belmont Abbey is your Catholic College and God is calling you to the "harvest."

give serious thought to how they spend their and God's time and resources.

Also, he said, they should ask: "How am I being the instrument today, making God present, giving him glory, assisting my sister and brother, coming to a deeper understanding and greater insight into God's use of me as an instrument?"

Catholics must be open to listening to God by choosing "quiet and silence," to create a balance between activity and stillness, he said.

After reading the First Book of Kings story of Elijah hearing God's whispering voice, Father DeSantis said, "I like to have it more evident, but as you and I know, it doesn't occur that way."

"We need to be very attentive, to listen so very carefully," he said. "We need to really just be still — as is told to us, 'Be still and know that I am God.'"

Catholics, he said, must look at the reasons why they minister to others and to really engage those to and with whom they minister.

"I see Jesus looking directly into their eyes," Father DeSantis said. "There is an intensity, a presence; there is a desire to communicate, a desire to give, and he follows through."

"Baggage" obstructs ministry and openness to God, he said. It's more than just excess possessions.

"What else are we holding onto?" Father DeSantis asked.

The Gospel, he said, is meant "to be that sword that cuts right through, to really challenge me: 'Linus, are you holding a grudge? Is there someone you haven't spoken with in five years?'"

"If that's the case, I have to resolve that, to ask forgiveness, to lay something aside. That Gospel that I preach ... before I preach to anybody, I preach to myself," Father DeSantis said. "Every time you pick up a Bible, every time you read from Scripture, think about it:

"What is the Lord saying to me?"

"You see, that's what life is all about," he continued. "You're created in God's image and likeness. You can't say you're bad, because God created you. You're not your own. What you can say is that you're good and that you want to build on that goodness, you want to work with God to complete what God has begun."

Pat Mahon, a parishioner at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Hayesville, liked the Scripture references and the advice about getting rid of that "baggage."

"The value of a day like this is that we can step back and evaluate where we are," he said.

Jose Martinez, a parishioner at Holy Redeemer Church in Andrews, was equally complimentary about Augustinian Father Robert Dueweke's Spanish-language presentation to Hispanic attendees, "Espiritualidad de la Pastoral de Conjunto."

Martinez said Father Dueweke, Hispanic minister at Immaculate Conception Church in Canton and St. Margaret of Scotland Church in Maggie Valley, emphasized "that we need to work together as a real team; that when we work together, God is in it. You have to have spirituality to have a real team."

The term, "pastoral de conjunto," doesn't really have an English translation, Father Dueweke explained, but refers to "collaborating with the spirit of God and the building of the kingdom of God."

"The main characteristic of the kingdom of God is a reality of community — the call of communion with God and with one another," Father Dueweke said, "everything that we do that gives a glimpse of the communion with God."

"Pastoral de conjunto, he added, is the "practice of living communion in a parish setting."

The U.S. bishops' 1987 "National Pastoral Plan for Hispanic Ministry," Father Dueweke said, "emphasized the harmonious coordination of all the elements of pastoral ministry, such as the pastoral ministers themselves and the structures of the parish and the diocese, with one common goal — the kingdom of God."

"Pastoral ministers," he explained, are not just priests, but everyone who is involved in ministry.

"There is no room for clericalism," Father Dueweke said. "Clericalism is a structural sin. It is a concentration of power within the hands of the ordained, where the majority of the baptized are left out of the decision-making processes."

"It's a form of authoritarianism, rather than the people of God as defined by Vatican II in 'Lumen Gentium,'" he said.

Spirituality, Father Dueweke said, is about harmony, which, "is not everyone thinking and acting alike, but the harmonious coordination of diverse views toward a common goal."

Silence is required for reflection before dialogue, he said.

"Silence and dialogue are parts of the spirituality of communion," Father Dueweke said. "We share from the silence. Dialogue is the rhythm of interpersonal relationships with self, God, others, the created world."

Dialogue, he said, means "inter-change of ideas, seeking the truth together, freedom and creativity."

A new asceticism is required.

This asceticism (training and discipline), he said, includes forming teams for various tasks; listening with attention during meetings, because such listening is an act of love; being willing to "sacrifice your precious ideas" to achieve goals; "problems are not only discussed but are taken to prayer"; and living the truth with courage.

When there is no pastoral de conjunto, Father Dueweke said, "we build our kingdom, not the kingdom of God. We are deaf to the word of God, blind to the movement of the Spirit. Fragmentation and frustration become part of our daily lives. We have a lesser commitment to live the Gospel."

Without pastoral de conjunto, he added, with a play on the conference title, "there is no good news and because of that, there is no fire in the mountains."

Fourth-grader appeals to legislators

Crock advocates for food allergy education in classroom

CHARLOTTE — Emily Crock, a fourth-grader at Our Lady of the Assumption School in Charlotte, was selected to represent North Carolina and attended the inaugural Food Allergy and Anaphylaxis Network's (FAAN) "Kid's Congress on Capitol Hill" Oct. 18-19.

The program is geared toward creating a better understanding of food allergies, advocating for federal funding for food allergy research and encouraging elected officials to establish food allergy legislation in U.S. schools.

Emily, who suffers from a food allergy, wrote a winning essay with supportive material for the opportunity to join more than 70 school-aged children from 31 states and the District of Columbia as FAAN Junior Ambassadors.

As part of her ambassadorial duties, Emily met with North Carolina legislators in Washington to discuss a nationwide school food-allergy education act, introduced by Rep. Nita Lowey, D-NY.

The act will help establish a federal standard regarding the management of children at school who are at risk for anaphylaxis — a severe allergic reaction. Specifically, the act will direct the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services to develop a policy for managing the risk of food allergies and anaphylaxis in schools.

The federal policy would then be made available to local educational agencies, such as school boards, along with other interested parties and entities, including school nurses, administrators and teachers.

"The FAAN Kids' Congress on Capitol Hill is an important step for the millions of children with food allergies nationwide," said Anne Munoz-Furlong, founder and CEO of FAAN.

"The FAAN Junior Ambassadors advocated for the 1-in-every-25 children with food allergies about the need for more education in the classroom and school setting," said Munoz-Furlong.

FAAN believes new legislation is needed because food allergy management strategies often differ from state to state, school district to school district, and school to school. Additionally, a delay in administering epinephrine when a reaction occurs at school is believed to be a factor in fatal reactions.

The new law will ensure that everyone is prepared for these allergic emergencies.

FAAN is a Virginia-based nonprofit organization representing the 11 million Americans who have food allergies. Established in 1991, FAAN's mission is to increase awareness, to provide education and advocacy, and to advance research on behalf of all those affected by food allergies and anaphylaxis.

Council changed concept of marriage took place in a Presbyterian church, with his minister and her Catholic priest as equal participants.

The changes to Catholic marriage brought about by the Second Vatican Council went far beyond how and where an interfaith marriage could take place, but for many they were the most visible sign of the church renewal and openness brought by the council.

Many of the adaptations began long before the council, said Father Joseph Champlin, whose 1970 book, "Together for Life," is still used by four out of five couples planning a Catholic wedding.

In his own family, Father Champlin saw interfaith weddings move from a service in the rectory (his mother and non-Catholic stepfather, in the 1940s) to inside the church, but outside the Communion rail (his brother and non-Catholic sister-in-law, later in the 1940s) to within the church sanctuary and in the context of a Mass in the 1950s.

"It eased a lot of those hurts" and the feelings of rejection sometimes felt by the non-Catholic partner, said the priest, who serves as sacramental priest at Our Lady of Good Counsel Church in Warners, N.Y.

After Vatican II, the church eased another requirement for interfaith couples — that the non-Catholic partner sign a pledge to raise the children as Catholics. Beginning in the late 1960s, the non-Catholic needed only to make such a pledge verbally.

Ceremony planning

A key change in Catholic weddings after the Second Vatican Council was the couples' participation in planning the ceremony.

Pre-Vatican II, elements of the wedding ceremony were "rather rigid and the same for everybody," Father Champlin said. But afterward, "the church, as with all liturgical rites, urged participation in the liturgy," the priest said.

Couples could now select their own Bible readings and music and otherwise personalize the wedding ceremony.

"This immediately resonated with young Catholics," said Father Champlin, whose "Together for Life" and its various revisions over the years have sold 9 million copies.

Marriage and family

Beyond the ceremony itself, Vatican II changed the very concept of marriage in the Catholic Church, according to H. Richard McCord, executive director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Family,

The changes to Catholic marriage brought about by Vatican II went far beyond how and where an interfaith marriage could take place, and, for many, those factors were the most visible signs of the church renewal and openness brought by the council.

Laity, Women and Youth.

In "Gaudium et Spes," the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, the council said marriage was not only for procreation and "reached back to the biblical understanding of covenant" to define the sacramental bond between husband and wife, McCord said.

"Marriage to be sure is not instituted solely for procreation; rather, its very nature as an unbreakable compact between persons, and the welfare of the children, both demand that the mutual love of the spouses ... grow and ripen," the pastoral constitution says.

"Therefore, marriage persists as a whole manner and communion of life, and maintains its value and indissolubility, even when despite the often intense desire of the couple, offspring are lacking," it says.

The idea of marriage as a covenant also emphasized "the radical equality of persons" at a time when some still saw women as the property of their husbands, McCord said.

Each marital partner was to fully contribute his or her gifts and abilities to the other spouse and receive the same in return, he said.

"Lumen Gentium," the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, also contributed "a key idea that continues to play itself out in the pastoral ministry of the church" — the concept of the Christian family as domestic church, McCord said.

This "new way of understanding the role of the Christian family" was an ancient idea first articulated by St. John Chrysostom (347-407), but "rediscovered by the council fathers," he added.

As heads of the domestic church, parents are the "first evangelizers of their children" and "the first school of life and faith," Pope Benedict XVI said in a recent talk to a group of Mexican bishops.

The council's pronouncements on marriage still play a major role in helping present-day Catholic leaders articulate why they oppose efforts to legalize same-sex marriage, McCord said.

"The defining element of marriage is the conjugal love that is only possible between a man and a woman," he said. "It's not just custom. It's not just tradition."

Congress marks anniversary of 'Nostra Aetate'

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The House and Senate both approved a resolution recognizing the 40th anniversary of "Nostra Aetate," the declaration of the Second Vatican Council on Catholic relations with other religions.

The Senate passed the resolution by unanimous consent Nov. 10 and the House approved it with a 349-0 vote Nov. 7.

The resolution noted the Oct. 28, 1965, promulgation of the Vatican II document, and said it "affirmed the respect of the Roman Catholic Church for Hinduism, Buddhism, Islam and Judaism, and exhorted Catholics to engage in 'dialogue and collaboration with the followers of other religions.'"

"Nostra Aetate" recognized "the role of the Holy See in combating religious intolerance and religious discrimination," and said Congress by the resolution "encourages the United States to continue to serve in a leading role in combating anti-Semitism and other forms of religious intolerance and religious discrimination worldwide."

The resolution also asked President George W. Bush to issue a proclamation recognizing the document's anniversary.

U.S. bishops join in prayer at the start of the second day of their fall general meeting in Washington Nov. 15.

Major clergy sex abuse study approved by U.S. bishops stem child sex abuse.

The charter said the study was needed "to understand the problem more fully and to enhance the effectiveness of our future response."

The study plan calls for John Jay College to work with Jesuit-run Fordham University in New York and other experts across the country.

To be examined

A Nov. 16 news release by the U.S. bishops said that issues to be examined in the study include:

— Epidemic aspects of the sexual abuse incidents that surged in the 1970s and subsequently declined in the 1980s.

— Prominence of young adolescent males among the victims.

— Content and influence of seminary admission policies and priest formation programs before and after the 1980s.

— Differences between the lifestyle and formation of diocesan clergy and that of religious order priests that might explain any differences in cases of abuse perpetrated by members of the two groups.

— Ecclesiastical environment and the ways in which the church responded to reports of sexual abuse.

— Behavioral and psychological problems of abusers.

— Circumstances that enhanced the vulnerability of the victims.

— Cultural, social and psychological factors in U.S. society and the Catholic Church which contributed to sexual abuse of children, particularly during the 1970s' surge of incidents.

— Response of law enforcement to reports of clergy sexual abuse in the 1970s as compared with current responses.

— Common psychiatric treatment models of the 1970s as compared with current treatment models.

The study also plans to examine environmental aspects that influenced the risk factors for victims and predators.

Seeking causes and answers

This will be the second study conducted by John Jay College for the all-lay National Review Board appointed by the bishops to advise them on prevention policies and to monitor policy compliance.

The first John Jay study, published in 2004, provided statistics collected from U.S. dioceses and Eastern-rite eparchies on the nature and scope of the problem covering the 1950-2002 period. It reported that about 4 percent of U.S. priests ministering from 1950 to 2002 were accused of sexually abusing a minor.

The 2004 study said that 4,392 clergymen — almost all priests — were accused of abusing 10,667 people, with 75 percent of the incidents taking place between 1960 and 1984. It was the first comprehensive, national statistical study of the problem.

After the new study was announced, Jeremy Travis, John Jay president, said that the college pledges to do the research "with scrupulous objectivity and scientific rigor to advance society's understanding of the causes and context of the problem within the church."

John Jay was chosen to conduct the study from among several research institutions which submitted proposals.

The bishops have pledged $1 million toward the cost of the new study with the remainder of the funding being sought from Catholic and other philanthropic organizations.

The 13 members of the National Review Board include experts in the fields of education, law, psychology, psychiatry, church administration and medicine. Chairwoman Ewers is an educational consultant and former president of Pace University in New York.

Ewers told Catholic News Service that work on the study would begin immediately and take three years to complete.

There are several organizations interested in providing the additional funding for the study, she said.

"The study is a unique opportunity to gain significant insights into the problem," said Ewers.

At the USCCB's Nov. 14-17 fall meeting in Washington, the bishops:

— Adopted revisions to the book of Scripture readings for children's Masses in the U.S. and sent them to the Vatican for confirmation.

— Approved new guidelines for the growing phenomenon of lay ecclesial ministry in U.S. parishes.

— Approved a proposal to seek Vatican approval to retain current dollar levels at which different controls kick in for the disposal of church property.

— Authorized a rewrite of their 1982 preaching manual in light of "current liturgical understanding and practice."

— Approved a $131.2 million USCCB budget for 2006 that could result in up to $1.8 million in deficit spending.

— Held an informational session to prepare for the upcoming English translation of the Roman Missal for use in the United States.

— Consented in a voice vote to support the canonization cause of Fray Bartolome de las Casas, a Spanish friar who argued against the enslavement of native peoples by Spanish conquistadors.

— Received an update about a new effort to support the development of the Catholic Church in Africa.

'I Can' controversy

Parish cancels American Girl event; others urge boycott of doll maker

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Saying that "the pursuit of funds can't come at the cost of our integrity," the pastor of St. Luke Church in Brookfield, Wis., has canceled an American Girl school fundraiser set for May because of the doll company's ties to a nonprofit group that supports keeping abortion legal.

The American Girl's connection to Girls Inc. through the "I Can" bracelet project — which promotes girls' self-esteem and service — also has prompted criticism of the company by at least three organizations — Pro-Life Wisconsin, Pro-Life Action League and American Family Association.

The latter two organizations urged a boycott of American Girl, which produces a line of popular collectable dolls.

"We are asking people who care about little girls, and about the value of human life, to refrain from purchasing products and visiting American Girl Place during the entire Christmas shopping season," said Ann Scheidler, executive director of the Chicago-based Pro-Life Action League, in a Nov. 1 statement.

The head of Girls Inc. said, however, that the controversy resulted from "false, inflammatory statements from people who are pursuing a narrow political agenda."

American Girl representatives did not respond to Catholic News Service requests for comment on the controversy Nov. 2, but spokeswoman Julie Parks told The Associated Press earlier that some groups "have chosen to misconstrue American Girl's purely altruistic efforts."

Writing in his Oct. 30 parish bulletin, Father Francis Malloy, pastor, said the parish school had planned an American Girl fashion show for May. The company sells dolls, related books and doll accessories through its Web site and catalog and at stores in Chicago and New York.

"It seemed like a match made in heaven, a motivated Catholic school and an all-American icon," Father Malloy wrote. "We seemed poised to raise enough funds for a new playground and a remake of the school library."

But following a special meeting of the Home and School Association at St. Luke Church, the pastor canceled the fundraiser, forfeiting a $1,000 deposit. Although the parish hopes to get the deposit returned, "even if we don't it probably won't matter," Father Malloy said. "The real lesson is one of integrity."

"We are a Catholic school and we do have core values of faith and tradition," he added. "These we pass on to our young people — it's why we have a school. We do believe in preparing our daughters to be strong women of principle — we just happen to disagree with Girls Inc."

Formerly known as Girls Clubs of America, Girls Inc. "develops research-based informal education programs that encourage girls to take risks and master physical, intellectual and emotional challenges," according to its Web site.

"Major programs address math and science education, pregnancy and drug abuse prevention, media literacy, economic literacy, adolescent health, violence prevention and sports participation," it says.

"Recently, our mission to help girls develop their self-esteem and self-reliance has become the target of false, inflammatory statements from people who are pursuing a narrow political agenda," said Joyce Roche, president and CEO of Girls Inc., in a statement.

"Girls Inc. stands on its long positive history. The millions of lives we have touched speak for who we are and our values," she said.

On its Web site, Girls Inc. said it "supports a woman's freedom of choice, a constitutional right established by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1973 in Roe vs. Wade." It also says girls have a right to "convenient access to safe, effective methods of contraception and protection from disease."

In September, American Girl launched the "I Can" bracelet project, selling bands that carry the American Girl "I Can" promise: "I can be myself, follow my dreams and always do my best. I can reach for the stars, lend a hand to others and be a good friend. I can make a difference! I promise to try."

American Girl, a subsidiary of Mattel Inc., said it would donate net proceeds from the band sales to Girls Inc. and would make an additional $50,000 donation to the organization to support its educational programs.

Peggy Hamill, state director of Pro-Life Wisconsin, praised Father Malloy and St. Luke Church for canceling the planned American Girl fundraiser.

"The parish sacrificed possibly thousands of dollars to take a stand for life," she said. "Such courage will most likely not, however, go unrewarded. It would only take a few people who decide not to purchase an American Girl doll, and instead send their money to St. Luke, for the parish to recoup their losses."

The American Family Association, based in Tupelo, Miss., called Girls Inc. a "pro-abortion, pro-lesbian group" and urged its members to tell American Girl that its decision to support Girls Inc. "casts a great shadow over their trustworthiness to put the welfare of girls and children first."

Scheidler of the Pro-Life Action League said girls are being "unwittingly introduced to Girls Inc. through the 'I Can' bracelet program, and lured into contact with their radical feminist ideology."

"As consumers, we have both the freedom and the responsibility to spend our gift dollars in a manner consistent with our values," she added. "There are excellent alternatives to American Girl dolls. We expect that many families will choose to reject American Girl this Christmas."

A roundup of Scripture, readings, films and more

'Goblet' full of action, suspense

BY DAVID DiCERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK (CNS) — "Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire" conjures enough movie magic to cast a satisfying spell over audiences.

"Goblet of Fire" is the fourth movie adapted from the hugely popular fantasy novels by British author J.K. Rowling.

The film is entertaining, intelligent and visually delicious, but despite considerable plot-pruning, at an unwieldy two hours and 37 minutes this "Goblet" runneth over a bit long.

Continuing the moodier tone set by 2004's "Harry Potter and the Prisoner of Azkaban," the new installment — the darkest thus far — is the first in the franchise to be rated PG-13.

From its spooky opening image, the film is probably too scary for young children, who might have nightmares, precisely what's plaguing Harry (Daniel Radcliffe) at the story's outset.

This is especially true for the scenes involving the "Death Eaters," agents of the evil Lord Voldemort (Ralph Fiennes in fearsome face makeup), who finally makes his much-anticipated appearance.

But for most of "Goblet," the story revolves around a three-task, interscholastic competition known as the Triwizard Tournament to be hosted at Hogwarts. Harry is chosen to compete along with a Hogwartsian upperclassman, a French enchantress and a Bulgarian bruiser.

The dangerous trials pit them against fire-breathing dragons, menacing mermaids and a sinister hedge-maze. But to bashful Harry, those perils pale compared to the harrowing ordeal of finding a date for Hogwarts' annual Yule ball, injecting some lighthearted teen romance into the abracadabra action mix.

The onset of awkward adolescence adds an interesting new emotional dimension to the relationships of the three young leads. (The film could have done without an eyebrow-raising scene in which a frisky girl ghost cozies up to a thoroughly embarrassed Harry while bathing.)

As with the magical elements in its predecessors, those in "Goblet of Fire" should be viewed as time-honored storytelling devices, like those employed throughout the history of Western fantasy literature from childhood fairy tales to Arthurian legends and Shakespeare.

Daniel Radcliffe stars in "Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire."

"old magic" wrought by the sacrificial love of Harry's mother (who died protecting him in his infancy) seems to echo the salvific "Deeper Magic" spoken of in C.S. Lewis' Christian-allegorical "The Chronicles of Narnia."

Curbed is Harry's habit of rule-breaking. Perhaps as he matures, so has his sense of integrity, evidenced by his — on more than one occasion — endangering his chance of winning to do the honorable thing (that is, saving a life).

"Goblet of Fire" presents the clearest delineation between "right" and "wrong" in the series thus far, even introducing moral imperatives into the students' hocus-pocus curriculum.

Despite lots of wand-waving, the real victories are won through self-sacrifice. As Dumbledore counsels, "We must face the choice between what is right and what is easy."

Such life lessons would support the contention of Father Peter Fleetwood, a Vatican official formerly of the Pontifical Council for Culture, that "the chief concern of ... (Rowling) is to help children understand the conflict between good and evil."

The film contains frightening images, scenes of intense menace and some sexual innuendo. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

We are all called to serve in our own ways

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

What strikes me as I read about John the Baptist is how different he was: that he had a message entrusted to him, and that he went about fearlessly and obediently announcing that One more powerful than he was coming, One who would baptize not with water but with the Holy Spirit.

Sounds like the advent of a whole new thing in religion to me.

I've had a handful of friends who remind me of John the Baptist in their "differentness," their obedience and the clarity of their announcing the one who baptizes in the Spirit.

Bob and Mary — just to name two — each have a joy so transparent, a goodness so strong that, as with John the Baptist, anyone who is around them for very long can't help but know they are different. And that leads to their other characteristic, which is a willingness to announce God's good news, if not at first, then after a reasonable length of time has passed.

By the time they start to speak of the One who baptizes with the Spirit, their words have an authority I'm afraid my own will never quite have.

They have a gift for proclaiming the love of God that I wish I did possess. But, like anyone reading this, I have my own gifts.

For me, they are gifts of compassion and a facility with words (at least some of the time), and in my limited gifts I have found my own way to enter into the Christian's work of telling others about the One who brings the Holy Spirit.

Each of us, whether a grocery clerk, teacher, computer entry operator, businessperson or stay-at-home mom, has a specific place and a specific way we interact with others. We offer news of this now-identified person of whom John the Baptist spoke in guarded terms because he did not know his name.

We know his name and are formed in it and by it. We know the One John announced did indeed come in the flesh, and so we ourselves share John's mission, the mission of announcing Jesus.

Question:

How do you think God wants to use you to bring his love to others in the everyday contacts of your life?

Scripture to Illustrate:

"Make ready the way of the Lord. Clear him a straight path" (Mark 1:3bc).

Joaquin Phoenix stars in "Walk the Line," a superior biopic about country singer Johnny Cash (a mesmerizing Phoenix, who does his own singing). It traces the singer's childhood, marred by the accidental death of his older brother and his father's subsequent coldness, through an unfulfilling first marriage and his budding romance with singer June Carter (Reese Witherspoon, who matches her co-star in the singing and acting departments), drug dependency and ultimate survival.

Director James Mangold deftly balances the personal drama with plenty of good music, making for first-rate entertainment, though the touching romance between the married Cash and Carter — despite cautious treatment by scriptwriter Gill Dennis — is naggingly problematic from a basic moral, as well as Catholic, perspective.

Some rough and crude language, ethnic slurs, scenes of domestic violence, drug and alcohol use, and an extramarital relationship. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Faith on film

'Narnia' film may signal greater acceptance of faith-themed movies

BY GUY FITZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

PLANO, Texas — The Dec. 9 release of "The Chronicles of Narnia: The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe," the potential Christmas blockbuster based on a novel by Christian writer C.S. Lewis, may signal Hollywood is focusing more on audiences for whom religion is important.

David DiCerto, a movie reviewer for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said he has noticed more movies being targeted toward Christian audiences.

This can be seen as "an economic byproduct of the success of 'The Passion of the Christ,'" he said.

With Mel Gibson's film grossing more than $400 million in worldwide box office proceeds, Christian audiences are establishing themselves as a lucrative market for Hollywood producers. Grass-roots evangelical campaigns are starting to grow around religious-themed movies being released.

In October, Stonebriar Community Church in Plano hosted about 300 moviegoers for a sneak peek of "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe." Local faith leaders were selected as attendees.

The event was one of 140 held across the United States by Motive Entertainment, which also conducted similar events for the "The Passion."

The Stonebriar event was billed as an "exclusive experience for leaders of faith in the community." It was attended by Michael Flaherty, president of Walden Media, the Narnia film production company, and Doug Gresham, co-producer of the film and stepson of Lewis.

For Flaherty and Walden Media, attending the outreach-oriented sneak peek was just one part of promoting the movie.

"People seem to be interested that we're going to churches to promote this movie, but we're also going to schools, libraries, Boy Scout and Girl Scout groups," said Flaherty.

In addition to exclusive clips of the film and hearing Grammy-winning Christian musician Steven Curtis Chapman perform songs from the Narnia album, audience members received free material describing how the movie story can be incorporated into local outreach activities.

"What I found interesting was the number of important figures from Disney and Walden Media that were there to court the Christian market," said John Reis, national accounts director of Good News Advertising, a Dallas-based company.

Good News Advertising was hired to put "Narnia" advertisements in 64 Christian newspapers nationwide, including 46 Catholic newspapers, The Catholic News & Herald among them.

"The sneak peek gave me the sense that they realize the viability of the Christian market," Reis said.

"The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe" is the story of four children growing up in World War II-era England. The children stumble upon a magical wardrobe that transports them to the world of Narnia. The children embark on a quest to save the land from an evil witch with the help of Narnia's noble ruler, the lion Aslan.

Lewis wrote "The Chronicles of Narnia" as a seven-book series, published between 1950 and 1956. The faith of Lewis, who died in 1963, often played a part in his writing. He was Anglican.

"We're interested in telling great stories and being true to the original themes of the author," said Flaherty. "Many times these great stories we want to tell will have elements of faith in them, and we don't shy away from that."

Some say the lion Aslan represents Jesus Christ, because the lion dies and is resurrected in the story. The witch represents evil. Many other Christian lessons and stories develop throughout the four children's journey.

With such strong faith-based themes, it seems natural for a movie such as "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe" to be aimed at Christian audiences. Depending on its success, a greater number of movies may be released with similar elements.

DiCerto could not attest to the fact that more movies are coming out with Christian themes, but "keep in mind," he said, "(Hollywood producers) are going to be open to any audience that can make them money. If it helps sell tickets, moviemakers are going to emphasize Christian elements in movies."

International torch run comes to diocese

CHARLOTTE — Runners are carrying a symbol of unity through the Diocese of Charlotte. For the fourth consecutive year, a group of young people from New York City has organized the "Antorcha Guadalupana." This international torch run is meant to unite families who have been divided by the U.S.-Mexico border through their Catholic faith and their love for Our Lady.

The torch run began in Mexico City at the Shrine of Our Lady of Guadalupe in October and will culminate in New York City Dec. 12, the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe.

Over the past two months, the group has carried the torch from city to city celebrating Masses in honor of Our Lady and sharing with the community the concerns of immigrants in the United States.

This year the torch will visit four communities in the Diocese of Charlotte: Our Lady of Guadalupe Church in Charlotte, Nov. 28; St. Joseph Church in Newton, Nov. 29; St. Francis of Assisi Church in Mocksville, Nov. 30; and Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point, Dec. 1.

Each visit begins with the reception of the torch between 5 and 6 p.m., followed by Mass and a presentation. The following morning, runners from the community accompany the core group to the next stop. The visits are open to the public and the presentations are bilingual.

Youths participate in a group game during the "Rescued" youth retreat held at Holy Family Church in Clemmons Nov. 18-20.

Clemmons the weekend of Nov. 17-20.

"There were 11 members of the team consisting of adults, young adults and teenagers who put this very successful retreat together, said Deacon Mike Langsdorf, permanent deacon at Divine Redeemer Church in Boonville and a member of the leadership team.

The team meets to plan the spiritual and catechetical experience and retreat theme, and organize the people and resources needed to carry out the retreat.

"These retreats also train future youth leaders and who take these skills with them into adulthood," said Peg Ruble, assistant director for diocesan youth ministry.

This retreat's theme came from the Scripture readings for Nov. 20, the Feast of Christ the King, which say "God is the Good Shepherd and will save, or rescue, all of us who are the sheep of his fold," said Deacon Langsdorf.

During the retreat, the youths explored the Scripture readings, explored contemporary Christian anthropology and took part in eucharistic adoration.

They then broke into small groups to contemplate what being saved and rescued meant to them, and who does the saving. The groups came up with both physical and scriptural aspects of being rescued.

Emie Dillard, a junior at Elon University in Elon, spoke about how she traveled with 50 students to Bay St. Louis, Miss., after Hurricane Katrina.

"We camped out in the front yard of the parish, bringing help and hope to those who have lost everything," said Dillard. "They didn't even have rosaries. Therefore we are making rosaries at this retreat to send down to them."

Dillard hoped the retreat gave the youths the inspiration "to help rescue others, knowing that they have Jesus working through them."

"I am getting stronger in my faith, like Jesus," said Katherine Haugen, a parishioner of St. James the Greater Church in Concord. "You don't feel as though you're so far away and I understand things better."

The retreat helped Raquel Hernandez get more in touch with the Catholic Church, its teachings, her peers and with God, and "how to be rescued."

"I am being rescued from stress at school in a very spiritual way," said Raquel, a parishioner of Divine Redeemer Church in Boonville.

Caitlyn Finney found ways to be rescued after a bad day of work. More importantly, she said, she came to understand that in "everything you do, God is always there."

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION SUPPORT

Be a Champion-in-Christ
"To such as these does the Kingdom of God belong."
Matthew 19:14

Even though the Christians of the Holy Land are directly descended from the first Christians converted by the Apostles:

- They are in a desperate struggle to survive as a community.
- They are isolated from the rest of Christendom.
- They are down to only 2% of the population from 18% in 1948.
- They are suffering from overt discrimination and their economy is being destroyed, and their children are stigmatized in the public schools.

The Catholic Schools play an integral role in preserving the Christian heritage of the Holy Land.

The Catholic Archbishop of Jerusalem, the Latin Patriarch Michel Sabbah, recognizes this need and supports the parochial school system to educate all native Christian Children of the Holy Land.

A gift from you will help educate a child in the Catholic School system. It takes only $25 per month or an annual gift of $300 to assure the primary and secondary education of a Christian child in the Holy Land.

"It is essential that we, as Christians in the Diocese of Charlotte, reach out to our brothers and sisters in the Holy Land at this time of great need. By sponsoring a child for Christian education, we can help ensure the presence of the original Christians and actively contribute to the continuity of our Christian heritage."

Evolution versus intelligent design controversy

Q. We read much today about evolution, creation and intelligent design. Some scientists, according to the stories, deny the need of a Creator. The universe, they say, can explain itself without bringing God into the picture.

Obviously we would not agree. Would you explain what this evolution versus ID controversy is all about? Can scientists really prove, or try to prove, God does not exist or did not create the world? (Ohio)

A. I'm sorry that a helpful explanation of the relationship between creationism and intelligent design, and their connection to evolution, would be far beyond the limits of this column. But extensive information is readily available from your library or through an Internet Google search under these topics.

One important point may be made, however, concerning your second question. The physical sciences themselves will never be able to prove either the existence or nonexistence of God.

In Christian tradition we hold that God is "pure spirit." That means there is nothing material or physical in the Divine Being, nothing that has physical parts that can be measured or weighed — or broken off.

If that is true, there cannot possibly exist a place in our cosmos that one could point to and say, Here is the spot where something physical came out of God, here is where creation began. There can be, so to speak, no physical "belly button" in the universe, no trace anywhere of some sort of umbilical cord by which material existence flowed from God into this world.

In that specific sense, the material universe must be a "closed system," existing and operating within itself. There could be no transfer of physical matter or energy from Creator to creature.

This means that physical sciences alone, whatever more they learn about how the universe began and how it functions, cannot possibly prove there was no intelligent Creator behind what happened.

They may discover much that changes our conceptions of how God functions in this world. That has happened often, particularly in the past 400 years, and is happening today.

In the end, however, when all relevant scientific evidence is gathered (which certainly is not yet), the most science can declare is that no physical evidence exists of any outside divine activity that started the whole thing. As I explained above, not only would we agree with that; we would say that's the way it must be.

If a cosmologist or astrophysicist or mathematician, therefore, were to claim that no Creator is needed to explain the universe, he would have jumped outside the field of natural sciences and be speaking as a philosopher or theologian — speaking no longer within his competence as a physical scientist.

Unfortunately our culture has a curious tendency to assume that people prominent in one field — movie stars, authors, even clergy — are authorities on almost everything else as well.

We must also admit that we can never prove, from physical evidence alone, that there is a God, a personal, intelligent Creator. Our physical reach extends only to the edges of the physical universe. We need something else to go beyond that.

Obviously, we human beings have that "something else," the ability to think, to reason our way past what we can see and hear and feel to Someone who started it all by simply willing it into existence, Someone who gave it direction and purpose, even if that design evolves over billions of years.

As St. Paul says and the church teaches, we humans are able to come to know the invisible God through the visible things he has made (Rom 1:20).

We all, scientists or not, and whatever our beliefs, seriously need to recognize the limits on how far either the physical sciences, or theology, can take us on such questions.

A free brochure in English or Spanish answering questions Catholics ask about baptism practices and sponsors is available by sending a stamped, self-addressed envelope to Father John Dietzen, Box 5515, Peoria, IL 61612.

Questions may be sent to Father Dietzen at the same address, or e-mail: jjdietzen@aol.com.

What's in a name?

Identity helps in relationships with God, others

What's in a name?

The first thing we do in the baptismal rite for babies is to give them a name. We say to the parents, "What name do you give to your child?"

This makes sense. You cannot have a relationship with someone unless you at least know the person's name. The name is a sort of "handle."

In the Bible, the first thing God asked Adam to do after creation was finished was to give a name to all the birds and animals. It was the beginning of a relationship between man and all the creatures of the earth.

In my parish we always explain the importance of naming to parents. We tell them it expresses our hope for the person. That is why Christians often take a name from our Christian heritage, like Mary, or the name of a virtue, like Faith.

We want our children to have names of the great saints who are heroes of the faith or of great virtues to which we aspire.

This message seems to be lost on parents today. Often they name them for movie stars or celebrities. Sports figures account for a pretty fair number of names.

These things go in fads. There were a lot of girls called "Morgan" and boys called "Jordan" for a while. I don't think anybody will be naming their girls "Katrina" or "Wilma" for a while after this hurricane season.

I pretty much go along with anything, but I draw the line when they start naming children after luxury automobiles. Lexus and Infiniti are not entirely unknown.

When the touring company of "Late Night Catechism" came to our parish, Sister asked each person, "What's your name, dear?" If someone answered, "Wendy," Sister asked, "Is there a St. Wendy?" Sister did not approve.

If they'd been thinking, they should have answered, "Not yet, but I'm working on it."

Remembering names is a key pastoral skill. I'm pretty lousy at it.

I learned all the techniques for remembering a name. Repeat it as soon as you hear it. Write it down if you can. Use the name at least once in a sentence as soon as you meet the person: "So Howard, how did you find our parish?"

These techniques don't work with me. I often find myself "handle-less" with people, even after they have been in the parish a long time.

Our archbishop, Cardinal Theodore McCarrick, is a genius with names. He can meet someone once and remember the person's name.

I was stunned the first year he came to our archdiocese when he called out each priest's name as we came forward to meet him. Later I discovered that his secretaries were whispering our names to him as we approached. That's what I need, a prompter.

My secretary is much better with names than I am. In general I think women are better at names because they are better with relationships.

When people call or come by, I often ask our secretary, "Are they one of ours?" She not only knows their names, she knows the names of all their children and in-laws.

People have an easy time with me. They just call me "Father" — except in Mexico where I am "Padrecito," "Little Father." That's the beauty of a uniform.

In heaven I plan on asking God for a better memory for names. That way I will be able to call everybody's name. It would be embarrassing to forget Moses or somebody important.

But I think I will just call the ones I can't remember "Saint." I figure nobody will object to that name.

Anatomy of an execution

Capital punishment at odds with family's mercy

Who is wronged in a killing? The victim, of course; and the victim's family, the people who have to live with a gnawing sense of injustice when a loved one is needlessly taken.

In 1990, Teresa Syriani was murdered by her husband Elias at their Charlotte home. The Syrianis had been married for 15 years and had four children. But the marriage was falling apart because of Elias' violence. He was abusive and she had filed for divorce.

Teresa's life ended in her driveway, in her car. Elias vented his rage with a screwdriver, stabbing her 28 times. John Syriani was 10 years old that day. He remembers it well; he was in the car with his mother.

Elias was convicted and sent to death row in Raleigh to await his fate as the appeals dragged through the courts. A year passed, then four, then nine, then 12. John and his three sisters, Rose, Sarah and Janet, had nothing to do with their father.

Then in 2003, when Elias had been locked away for 13 years, his children chose to forgive him.

Forgiveness soon blossomed into a quest for mercy as Elias' four children traveled the state, telling their story.

They were the victims who were most traumatized by their father's senseless brutality. Even though they had to grow up without a mother, they had no thirst for vengeance and didn't want the state to kill their father, the only parent they had left.

Senseless pre-meditated violence had already taken their mother. Now pre-meditated violence was going to be repeated on their father, this time sanctioned by the state.

Our court system determines the guilt or innocence of those who are brought before it. Elias was found guilty and a jury of his peers decided that death was the proper punishment. Appeals went nowhere. His only chance, the only possibility for the Syriani family to stay together, was for Gov. Mike Easley to grant clemency.

Gov. Easley is a Catholic who is pro-abortion and sometimes, but not always, pro-death penalty. His positions are at odds with often-repeated teachings of the Catholic Church. The eye-for-an-eye idea of justice shouldn't trump mercy.

Gov. Easley met with the Syriani children, who are all adults now, and he listened to their pleas. In the end he decided to give his OK to legally sanctioned violence.

In the dead of the night on Nov. 18, Elias was strapped to a gurney and rolled into the execution chamber of Raleigh's Central Prison. Tied down, Elias was injected first with a chemical that put him to sleep and then another that stopped his breathing.

As a family member, John Syriani could have joined the reporters and others who were there to witness his father's execution. John took a pass. Seeing one parent senselessly killed is enough.

Defense lawyer Henderson Hill put it best when he said, "We punished four innocent children already scarred by family violence. ... By taking the life of a man in the process of giving life back to his kids, we betray our own humanity."

Who is wronged in an execution? We all are.

Catholics must help others see dignity in all human life, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVII

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: Due to an early publishing deadline, we are unable to bring you the pope's weekly general audience.

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In a world increasingly against discrimination, Catholics must protect all human life, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Modern men and women understand that "the dignity of man is not based on the genes of his DNA and does not diminish in the presence of physical differences or genetic defects," the pope said Nov. 19, addressing participants at a Vatican conference on health care, ethics and the human genome.

"The principle of nondiscrimination on the basis of physical or genetic factors has entered deeply into consciences," the pope said. "This principle has its truest foundation in the dignity inherent in every man because he was created in the image and likeness of God."

Pope Benedict said it was true that secularization has "often obliterated the bond of temporal realities with their Creator, going so far as to disregard the need to protect the transcendent dignity of man and respect for his very life."

However, he said, it also is true that many people know something is missing in the secularized view of life.

"This means that possible new areas have opened for a profitable dialogue with society, and not only with believers, on important themes such as those related to life," the pope said.

Pope Benedict said "seeds of humanism" influenced by Judeo-Christian values remain present in even the most secularized societies, and those seeds can be encouraged to grow.

The pope said the church proclaims the value of every human life from the moment of conception based not only on the Gospel, but also on reason, and reason can be used to promote a wider acceptance of that value for the good of individuals and societies.

Priests, hospital chaplains and educators also must work to ensure that Catholic faithful are aware of the ethical implications of new advances in genetics and biomedical technology, he said. They need support when facing difficult medical decisions, but also when they vote in elections where biomedical issues are involved.

"If adequate instruction ... is lacking," he said, people could be easily swayed by the media or the presentation of only partial information.

Poverty: An abuse of human rights

Everyone has right to healthcare, security

Dr. Arjun Sengupta, the U.N. independent expert on human rights and extreme poverty, traveled to the United States to study poverty.

His itinerary included the homeless of the Bronx, the Immokalee farm workers of Florida, the hurricane-devastated of New Orleans, the ethnically and culturally diverse of the Mississippi Delta, Native Americans in upstate New York and people in the hollows of Appalachia.

The purpose of the trip focused on the expressions of poverty and possible efforts to address them. The underlying assumption of the trip: poverty is an abuse of human rights.

The richest nation on earth and poverty? What about the 2.8 billion people of the world who survive on less than $2 a day, those living in mud huts, those with little more than a sarong or loin cloth? Those graphic images depict absolute poverty and charge overindulgent nations with social sin.

But, the effects of the relative poverty in the United States fly under the radar when people live shorter lives with no healthcare, face financial insecurity from corporate decisions and experience their human potential halted by social and racial barriers.

"Bobby" in eastern Kentucky testified that he worked 30 years as a nurse's aid. Scratched on the right arm by a resident at a nursing home, he developed methicillin resistant staphylococcus aureus (MRSA); then later, high blood pressure. Without insurance, he could not get proper healthcare which compounded his problems.

He eventually had a stroke and is legally blind. Forced to declare bankruptcy, he lost his house. His family survives on Social Security Disability and food stamps, but he remains constantly behind on his rent and heavily in debt.

The subtlety of poverty in Appalachia extends to the environmental degradation that comes with mountaintop removal and irresponsible strip mining. Outside Hazard, Ky., "Jeff" showed the U.N. delegation a four-foot crack in his home's chimney caused by blasting a mile away.

Legally, a company can detonate 40,000 pounds of dynamite in one blast, but mining concerns routinely receive waivers for larger shots. The results: plates rattle and picture frames fall off the wall, cracks appear in chimneys and foundations.

Jeff lives with the fear that some night the pillars supporting his house will shift, sending the house with him and his retired mother and father down the mountainside.

The United Nations defines poverty as a denial of a life in dignity. Because everyone has a right to live in dignity, poverty equates to an abuse of human rights. Bobby deserves healthcare and Jeff's family has a right to security.

Poverty has three dimensions.

With "income poverty," a person cannot buy the essentials of life: food, clothing, shelter. On a second level, with "human development poverty" a person cannot access education, healthcare and the basic social services that allow a person to feel spiritually alive. Thirdly, with racism, sexism and other forms of "social exclusion," a person cannot participate fully in society.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the United Nations Dec. 10, 1948, implies that poverty is an abuse of human rights: "Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services ..." (Article 25).

The Catholic Church teaches that human rights arise from the dignity of being made in the image and likeness of God. Whether absolute or relative, poverty cannot be eradicated by mere charity, because it remains an abuse of human rights that calls for new structures of justice.

St. Luke Church a young, thriving parish in Mint Hill

ST. LUKE CHURCH

Vicariate: Charlotte

Pastor: Father James Hawker

Number of Households: 1,100

MINT HILL — The Charlotte area's shopping centers are complete with an endless variety of stores, restaurants, movie theaters and ... Catholic churches? In one instance, that was the case for seven years in southeast Charlotte, when St. Luke Church found its beginnings in, of all places, the theater complex of the Matthews Township Festival shopping center.

In an effort to meet the ever-growing needs of Charlotte Catholics, diocesan officials created an 11th parish in Mecklenburg County. In September 1987, St. Luke Church was formed, thus easing crowding at nearby Catholic churches and accommodating more of the influx of Catholics to the Charlotte area from various parts of the country.

Some 50 people made up the congregation when Father Joseph Mulligan, pastor of the newly created parish, celebrated the first Mass in the shopping center movie theater on Oct. 18, 1987.

In December, the parish moved to another shopping mall, Mint Hill Festival, in time to celebrate Christmas. Earlier that year, property along Lawyers Road — on which the present facility lies — was purchased for the future construction of a church.

A grassroots campaign to create a permanent parish home began in the summer of 1992. Called "Develop," the process included a series of town meetings and fundraisers. As Masses continued at the Mint Hill Festival, the parish busied itself with beginning construction of the new church on Lawyers Road.

Construction of the parish center was underway in October 1993. The resulting facility included an 8,600-square foot church, as well as space for educational and social functions. Much attention was paid to landscaping. Water and flower gardens were added, and a country-style picnic pavilion was built for parish functions.

Father Mulligan celebrated the first Mass at the new St. Luke Church in October 1994, thereby beginning a new phase in the history of the parish. From its rather unconventional shopping mall early stages, St. Luke Church was dedicated on the Feast of the Epiphany, Jan. 7, 1995, with then-Bishop William G. Curlin celebrating and Father Mulligan concelebrating.

The parish has made the sense of family and community a top priority in its young life. Parishioners keep active in many ministries and organizations, under which dozens of committees, groups and projects operate. St. Luke parishioners participate in a number of community-level undertakings as well, including several ecumenical activities.

Some of the parish's ministries include Room in the Inn; Refugee Mentoring Ministry, a pilot ministry in collaboration with Catholic Social Services Refugee Resettlement Office; Uptown Men's Homeless Shelter; Kairos Prison Ministry; Thomasboro School Outreach; RAIN; Habitat for Humanity and Jamaica Ministry.

After several years of steady growth, the parish constructed a Family Life Center in 1996. This center is used for worship services as well as a variety of educational and social activities.

Since 2001, when Father James Hawker assumed the pastorate, 400 families have been added to the parish registry.

So far, $650,000 has been pledged toward eliminating the debt on the parish center. In the next six years, Father Hawker hopes ground will be broken for a permanent church.

Although it is one of the youngest parishes in Charlotte, St. Luke Church has wasted no time in practicing and expanding the ministry of the Catholic Church in western North Carolina. In fewer than 20 years, it has managed to integrate into the Church family while retaining an identity all its own.

BISHOPS APPROVE LAY

GUIDELINES

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops Nov. 15 approved a major document giving guidelines on lay ecclesial ministry after some debate over use of the terms "minister" and "ministry" with regard to lay people serving the church.

The debate ended after Cardinal Avery Dulles, long one of the country's most noted Catholic theologians, rose to defend the usage in the text, saying the drafters "were very careful to see that the terminology is in accord with the documents of the Holy See and with a whole series of documents previously published by this conference."

RUNNING ON FAITH

Running cross country is a family activity for the Peters family. All of the children run cross country for the team at St. Matthew School in the Diocese of Nashville, Tenn., which their parents coach.

Tennessee clan makes cross-country running a family affair

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (CNS) — Meet Team Peters: Mom, Mary; Dad, Mark; 12-year-old Michael; 11-year-old Daniel; 9-year-old Emily; 7-year-old twins, Will and Tom; and 6-year-old Clare.

The Peters are parishioners at St. Matthew Church in Franklin, and all of the children attend St. Matthew School. They all run cross country too.

The family takes having fun at running very seriously. The Peters children participate in the Nashville diocesan cross-country running program, representing St. Matthew Church, and Mary and Mark Peters are coaches of the parish team.

"I started running when I was in seventh grade, and have been running ever since," Mark Peters said. "When I started dating Mary, running seemed to be part of our life together."

After Mark and Mary Peters married and children started coming on the scene, they just sort of fell into step.

"When Michael and Daniel were just babies, we'd take the stroller to the track, and I ran laps while Mary walked them," said Mark Peters. "So they've just always seen me doing it, and over time they became interested in it too."

As more sons and daughters joined the Peters team, running just became an integral part of the family picture.

"It's never been a forced effort," Mary Peters said. "It's just a fun, healthy lifestyle activity. And it's a life sport; it's something they can take with them anywhere."

The Peters children are racking up the accolades. All six of them ran in five different races in this year's final competition Oct. 16. Michael won an individual trophy, coming in first in the seventh- and eighth-graders' race, and the St. Matthew boys' team finished first.

At some time during the 2005 cross-country season, five of the six have won at least one race, with the oldest, Michael, winning four times.

But winning isn't everything. For many of the young competitors on the St. Matthew team, their goal is simply to improve on their own previous records.

The Peters children have different reasons for participating. Daniel likes cross-country running because of the diverse terrains. Michael enjoys setting his own personal goals. Emily loves making new records, Tom thinks running is an exciting sport, and his twin brother, Will, likes getting the exercise but also enjoys running for his school.

For Dad, running also means a chance to delve deeper into his faith.

"I found that running was an opportunity to be away from the rat race of life, a time to collect my thoughts and think about the day and where life was headed," he said. "It was a very cleansing thing, to think deeper thoughts, even spiritual."

"It's hard not to think about God when it's a beautiful day, you're running through hills and different terrains where the trees are budding, and the smell is fresh and clean," he said.

Anniversary marks 60 years of little action to assist uninsured

WASHINGTON (CNS) — For the 45.8 million people in the United States without health insurance and for leaders in Catholic health care nationwide, Nov. 19 marked 60 years of failed efforts to achieve national health reform resulting in universal coverage.

On Nov. 19, 1945, President Harry S. Truman became the first U.S. president to call for such a plan, proposing that Social Security be expanded to include mandatory medical insurance.

"Millions of our citizens do not now have a full measure of opportunity to achieve and enjoy good health," he said. "The time has arrived for action to help them attain that opportunity and that protection."

For Sister Carol Keehan, a Daughter of Charity who is the new president and CEO of the Catholic Health Association, the anniversary offers "a dramatic reminder of how we continue to tolerate the intolerable," she said Nov. 15.

"How long can we tolerate millions without insurance and millions of others who are underinsured or still can't get the care they need?" Sister Keehan said.

Sister Bernice Coreil, who has been working in health care for more than 50 years, said the key problem is the lack of a national will to achieve comprehensive health care coverage for all Americans.

"We said we would get people to the moon by a certain time, and we did it, but we do not have a health care policy that says by the year 2015, every American will have access to health care," said Sister Coreil, also a Daughter of Charity.

The Catholic health care ministry must be a leader in efforts to cover the uninsured, said Mercy Sister Marie Hartmann, a veteran health care administrator with the Sisters of Mercy in Cincinnati.

"We need to ... awaken our social conscience as we look to how to solve this tremendous problem, which has certainly been exposed as a disgrace to our nation," Sister Hartman said.

Prepare for Advent, Christmas with 'spiritual fervor,' pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Wearing a heavy red cape to protect him from the cold, Pope Benedict XVI encouraged Christians to prepare for Advent, which begins Nov. 27, and for Christmas with "spiritual fervor."

"I ask you all to prepare for Advent with spiritual fervor, drawing from the word of God and the Eucharist interior energy for welcoming the Lord who comes," he said at his Nov. 23 general audience.

Because more than 25,000 people requested free tickets to the audience, the morning gathering was held in St. Peter's Square, where the temperature stayed below 45 degrees Fahrenheit and a cold breeze blew.

In his talk, the pope focused on the hymn of blessing found at the beginning of St. Paul's Letter to the Ephesians.

The pope said the hymn picks up similar "blessings" found in the Jewish tradition, but praises God as the "Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ."

The central figure is Christ, "in whom the work of God the Father is revealed and accomplished," the pope said.

By professing that Christians are chosen in Christ, filled with abundant grace and are made adopted sons and daughters of God through Christ, the hymn underlines the Christian vocation to brotherhood, unity and holiness, the pope said.

The hymn, he said, emphasizes the "excess, the giving without limit or reserve" of God's grace out of love and the fact that all creation was destined from the beginning of time to be united in Christ.

Pope Benedict ended his talk by saying, "Let us pray: 'Yes, Lord, draw us to yourself, draw the world to yourself and give us peace.'"

U.S. nun says Catholics should extend pro-life concerns to poor, war

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pro-life concerns must include protecting the vulnerable and opposing unjust wars, said a U.S. nun who participated in a Vatican-hosted international congress.

"If we want to be serious about creating a culture of life, we need to now think beyond things like abortion and euthanasia," said Holy Family Sister Carol Taylor, who directs the Center for Clinical Bioethics at Georgetown University.

The Pontifical Academy for Life and the John Paul II Institute for Studies on Marriage and the Family sponsored the Nov. 17-19 congress, which reviewed how ethical norms of Catholic teaching could better permeate modern science. It marked the 10-year anniversary of the publication of Pope John Paul II's encyclical "Evangelium Vitae" ("The Gospel of Life").

In her Nov. 19 speech to the conference, Sister Taylor cited Hurricane Katrina and the war in Iraq as two events that underline a need for Catholics to be consistent in their commitment to protect human dignity and life.

Katrina helped expose the immense poverty still plaguing America 40 years after President Lyndon B. Johnson declared a "war on poverty," she said.

"It was the elderly ... who died of gross neglect, and so aren't their deaths as important as the deaths caused by abortion or euthanasia?" she asked.

"No needless death is more tragic than another if every life is inviolable," she said in her speech. If Catholics are to be true to the legacy left by "The Gospel of Life," Catholics must "respect, protect, love and serve every human life."

Carl Anderson, supreme knight of the Knights of Columbus and a professor of family law at the John Paul II Institute in Washington, said a public culture that helps women and their children is lacking, and Catholics are uniquely suited to fill that vacuum.

Hurricane relief funds being dispersed along Gulf Coast, in Diocese of Charlotte

BY DAVID HAINS
SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — Due to the generosity of the people in the pews, the Diocese of Charlotte is distributing more than $700,000 for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Voluntary collections were conducted at nearly all of the 92 parishes and missions in the diocese in the aftermath of the hurricane that devastated the Gulf Coast in August.

Unlike the January and February collections for the victims of the tsunami that struck Southeast Asia in December 2004, in which the money was forwarded to a single agency, these funds are being distributed by the diocese to agencies in the hurricane-stricken area as well as to agencies in North Carolina.

"The people of the Diocese of Charlotte have once again demonstrated their love and concern for the victims of a disaster," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

Tsunami collections totaled $422,000 and were sent to the Baltimore-based Catholic Relief Services, the U.S. bishops' overseas aid agency.

From the hurricane collections, seven dioceses in Louisiana, two in Alabama and two in Mississippi are receiving a total of $520,000. The money will be spent on needs as identified by local authorities.

Ten service agencies within the Diocese of Charlotte responded to refugee needs in a variety of ways, including housing, food and health care. Those agencies, which are receiving $180,000, are in Charlotte, Mooresville and Winston-Salem.

Catholic Campus Ministry at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte is receiving $10,000.

"The students wanted to do something hands on to help a family. One week after we started talking about it, we had a house and a family of four living in it," said Grey Nun of the Sacred Heart Sister Eileen Spanier, campus minister.

"This ($10,000) grant will allow us to continue to meet the needs of Katrina evacuees," she said.

In addition to the $700,000 that was collected, the Diocese of Charlotte enrolled 47 students from hurricane-stricken areas in diocesan Catholic schools at no cost to the students' families. The individual schools absorbed the costs associated and are not receiving funds from the collection.

Parent Teacher Organizations at the schools helped evacuee families with textbooks, uniforms and supplies.

Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools, said some of the students have returned to the Gulf Coast.

"My office and the individual schools have received several letters of thanks from the families who were helped," said Cherry.

Cherry said the schools participated in a separate collection with the National Catholic Education Association. The "Child to Child" funds were distributed to faith formation programs in the devastated areas.

Then he said to His disciples, "The harvest is abundant but the laborers are few; so ask the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers for His harvest." (Mt 9:37)

I am praying that you will join me in responding to our Lord's request for more "laborers" in harvesting the abundant fruit to be found at Belmont Abbey College. Over 125 years ago the Benedictine Monks came south in response to God's call to begin His work in the vineyard of North Carolina.

He is calling you to place your hands upon the same bricks that were formed and put in place by these holy monks so long ago. conclusion of the Mass to dedicate the new Holy Family Church Nov. 27.

The dedication Mass was celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis, with Bishop Emeritus Curlin presiding. Msgr. Buttner, pastor, and Father Brian Cook, parochial vicar, concelebrated.

Several priests and permanent deacons of the Diocese of Charlotte were also in attendance, along with approximately 1,000 parishioners, guests and local officials and clergy.

In fewer than 30 years, Holy Family Church has grown to become the largest church in Clemmons and among the largest in Forsyth County. With an increased seating capacity from 575 to 1,250 worshippers, the new church can now accommodate its 1,600 registered families for its six weekend Masses.

More than 1,000 parishioners participated in the capital campaign to finance construction of the $3.6 million church. The campaign began in September 2002 and ground was broken for the new church June 5, 2004.

The new church includes Stations of the Cross imported from Italy, a skylight over the baptismal font, marble altar, ambo and altar of repose, altar flooring of Brazilian cherry wood, statues of Jesus, Mary and Joseph and crucifix imported from Spain.

The new bell tower carillon is programmed with more than 100 hymns for daily Mass, Sunday Mass and special occasions such as Christmas, Easter, weddings and funerals.

The new church includes an enlarged choir area, a nursery, family room, handicapped access to the church and a state-of-the-art audio system.

Bishop Curlin provided the altar carpet as a gift for the new church.

The old church will be used as a faith formation center, to be named the Bishop Curlin Faith Formation Center.

"When we stand in awe of what God is doing at Holy Family Catholic Church, we can only be humbled by the many blessings he has bestowed on us," said Msgr. Buttner. "We are hungry to share what God is doing in us and through us in the community, in our church and in our homes and to spread the love of Jesus throughout our area, so that others may experience a glorious life centered on our most holy Lord and God."

Holy Family Church was founded in 1976 as a mission of St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem. The first Mass was celebrated July 15, 1978 in Clemmons Presbyterian Church by Msgr. Richard Allen, then-pastor of St. Leo the Great Church.

While Clemmons Presbyterian Church had generously offered their hospitality, after two weekends of Masses, their Catholic guests were overflowing the facility.

For the next five years, the Saturday evening Mass and religious education classes were held at Clemmons Moravian Church and Sunday Masses were celebrated at the Clemmons Vogler Paulist Father Robert Scott was installed as the first pastor of Holy Family Church Aug. 15, 1980 with St. Francis of Assisi Church in Mocksville named as a mission. At that time, 200 families comprised the church's registry.

Construction on the original church was begun in February 1982, and the first Mass was celebrated in December 1984. By the mid-1980s, 550 families were registered at Holy Family Church, indicating the steady growth that would follow for the next 20 years.

"Our spiritual growth is infectious and has necessitated our expanded church. We have been blessed abundantly beyond our expectations," Msgr. Buttner said.

Vatican says no ordaining homosexuals, men who support 'gay culture'

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — A long-awaited Vatican document said the church cannot allow priestly ordination of men who are active homosexuals, who have "deep-seated" homosexual tendencies or who support the "gay culture."

Such people have serious problems relating properly to men and women and present a risk of "negative consequences" that should not be underestimated, the document said.

Prepared by the Congregation for Catholic Education, "Instruction Concerning the Criteria for the Discernment of Vocations With Regard to Persons With Homosexual Tendencies in View of Their Admission to the Seminary and to Sacred Orders," was officially released by the Vatican Nov. 29.

In recent weeks, some reports have suggested that the document would allow homosexual men to be ordained, as long as they had remained celibate for at least three years during seminary formation.

But the document does not say that; there is no discussion of "celibacy" of homosexual candidates. What it does say is that fleeting homosexual tendencies experienced in youth should not represent a bar to ordination — as long as those tendencies are clearly overcome.

The wording of the text presumes that homosexuality is not a permanent identity but a set of "tendencies" or an inclination that can, in fact, be overcome.

But the instruction makes no attempt to define the difference between "deep-seated" or "transitory" tendencies. Nor does it say what criteria would be used to determine whether a candidate had overcome such tendencies.

In explaining why homosexuals should not be ordained, the instruction refers to the teaching of the "Catechism of the Catholic Church," which describes homosexual acts as sinful and the homosexual inclination as "objectively disordered."

It follows, it said, that homosexuality is a bar to a priest's "affective maturity" and seriously impairs his ability to minister pastorally to the Catholic community.

Bishop William S. Skylstad of Spokane, Wash., president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said "it is certainly not acceptable if a candidate practices homosexuality or ... identifies himself principally by a homosexual inclination or orientation."

The aim of seminary education is to develop priesthood candidates who "display an 'affective maturity' which enables them to relate properly to others as chaste, celibate priests who can faithfully represent the teaching of the church about sexuality," he said.

"The priesthood is conferred on men who have given proof that they have been called by God to the gift of chastity in absolute and perpetual celibacy," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte, commenting on the document.

Although described by some media reports as Pope Benedict XVI's answer to clerical sex abuse, the decision to write the instruction predates the eruption of the sex abuse scandal and the pope's election.

Sources said the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith — then headed by Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, the current pope — suggested in 1996 that the education congregation prepare such a document. A first draft was completed in 1998, a second draft in 2002 and the final version this year.

Vatican II Council's impact on religious education still felt in U.S

more recent decades.

Instead, according to those in the field, religious education strives for a balance in handing down content and relating it to personal faith experiences.

Msgr. Dan Kutys, deputy secretary for catechesis for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said trends in religious education over the past several decades have been like a swinging pendulum.

Prior to the Second Vatican Council, he noted, religious education primarily focused on content. In the '70s and '80s, the focus was more on how the content was taught, he told Catholic News Service Oct. 5.

The pendulum, the priest said, came back to the center with the 1992 publication of the "Catechism of the Catholic Church," which he said helped "reclaim universal truths" of the Catholic faith.

The catechism and corresponding texts that have followed it, such as the Vatican's General Directory for Catechesis, the U.S. bishops' National Directory for Catechesis and the Vatican's "Compendium of the 'Catechism of the Catholic Church,'" currently available only in Italian, provide guidelines for religious educators on what aspects of the faith should be taught.

Religious educators today also implement modern teaching methods focusing on different learning abilities and the importance of linking doctrinal studies with personal faith experiences.

Then and now

Jerry Baumbach, director of the Center for Catechetical Initiatives at the University of Notre Dame in Indiana, said he thinks the dissonance is waning "between the content and methodology concerns of the past" referring to the disconnect some have perceived with handing down authentic teachings and focusing on how that is done effectively.

Instead, he told CNS Oct. 19, "authentic catechesis is a rich sharing of content and methodology working together."

Baumbach, who was a parish catechetical leader in the '70s in the Diocese of Albany, N.Y., just as the church was implementing Vatican II changes, said "a lot of good emerged from the council," and noted that it was an exciting time to be working in church ministry.

One immediate change for religious education was the newly emerging role of lay people in a ministry once primarily reserved for priests and women religious to carry out. Another change was the development and availability of tools, texts and background materials to use in teaching the faith.

Bridget Fichtner, a member of St. John of Rochester Parish in Fairport, N.Y., prepares for her first Communion at her Perinton, N.Y., home in late March. In religious education classes, students no longer recite the Baltimore Catechism as in past decades, nor do they focus on personal experiences and feeling as they had done in more recent decades.

Along with this new set of lay teachers and materials came necessary teacher formation and a means for determining if the newly published religious texts were in line with church teaching.

Marie Scanlon, coordinator of assessment for catechesis for the USCCB, recalled leading a catechist formation program in the Archdiocese of Philadelphia in the '70s that was not met enthusiastically by all participants, primarily because it was a change in the usual way things had been done.

Today, she is involved in the review process of catechetical texts. Once these are approved by a bishops' committee, the texts are deemed to be in conformity with the "Catechism of the Catholic Church."

Teaching the faith

Scanlon told CNS that just as Pope John XXIII said he wanted to open the windows of the church to let in some "fresh air" with Vatican II, "a whole new window opened for religious education" after the council.

The council specifically dealt with education in one of its 16 documents, the Declaration on Christian Education ("Gravissimum Educationis"). This document affirmed the right of parents to choose the type of education they wanted for their children, upheld the importance of Catholic schools and defended freedom of inquiry in Catholic colleges and universities.

But Scanlon pointed out that all of the council's documents "have messages for educators" and her own copy of the documents, collected in a paperback version, is well-worn.

"The documents refocused our efforts," she said. "They spoke to educators about what we were to do."

She noted that educators are constantly evaluating their approach and thus in recent years Catholic leaders are taking a close look at what has been gained and lost in current religious education.

As a result, there has been a renewed interest among educators to have students memorize basic prayers or even learn them in Latin.

"The pendulum is not static," said Scanlon, referring to the shifts in focus in religious education. "We are constantly searching for better ways to teach the faith."

Bishops approve lay ecclesial ministry guidelines

by two-thirds of the entire membership of the conference. It passed by a vote of 190-49 with five abstentions.

Bishop Dale J. Melczek of Gary, Ind., chairman of the bishops' Committee on the Laity, and Bishop Gerald F. Kicanas of Tucson, Ariz., chairman of the Subcommittee on Lay Ministry, presented the document to the bishops.

Bishop Melczek described it as a "resource for guiding the development of lay ecclesial ministry," a rapidly growing phenomenon in Catholic parishes in the U.S.

Bishop Kicanas stressed that "this document is not particular law. It does not lay down norms or prescriptions."

Rather, he said, it seeks to give bishops guidance in overseeing the "faithful development" of the growing practice of employing lay ecclesial ministers in parishes and other church institutions.

Redefining the ministry

The document says lay ecclesial ministry does not describe a new rank or vocation in the church; rather, it is a generic term for a variety of positions held by nonordained people who engage in substantial public leadership positions in church ministry, collaborating with the ordained leadership under their authority.

It sets out guidelines for the appropriate human, spiritual, intellectual and pastoral formation of those who are entrusted with such ministries. It also addresses the role of church authorities in certifying, authorizing and appointing lay ecclesial ministers.

It spells out the theology of lay ministry and the differences between ministry arising out of ordination and ministry arising out of the sacraments of initiation.

According to the latest national study, there are about 1.6 paid lay ecclesial ministers per parish and they now outnumber priests engaged in parish ministry.

According to the study more than 40 percent of lay ecclesial ministers in U.S. Catholic parishes are directors of religious education. About one-fourth are general pastoral associates, assisting the pastor in a wide variety of pastoral tasks.

The National Association for Lay Ministry welcomed the document, saying it "takes an important step forward in recognizing and supporting the significant role these lay ecclesial ministers play in the Catholic Church. It publicly affirms their leadership, invites appropriate authorization for their ministry and clarifies their accountability within ecclesial structures."

Ministry and service

Several bishops have questioned the use of the term "lay ecclesial minister," suggesting a danger that Catholics may not understand clearly the difference between lay ministry and the ministry proper only to those who are ordained.

Bishop Robert J. Baker of Charleston, S.C., argued that the church would be better served if the term "ministry" were restricted to those who are ordained. He asked that "roles of service" replace "ministry" in the phrase "lay ecclesial ministry" throughout the document.

Bishop Melczek said describing certain lay activities in the church as ministries is grounded in official church documents.

Bishop Nicholas DiMarzio of Brooklyn, N.Y., asked that the document be remanded to the committee with a request that it be reviewed by the Committee on Doctrine before coming to the bishops for a vote. He said he did not have a problem with the word "ministry," but with using "minister" to describe some lay people.

Bishop Blase J. Cupich of Rapid City, S.D., said the document's use of minister and ministry followed the clear practice of the church and official church documents.

The bishops rejected a proposal by Bishop Allen H. Vigneron of Oakland, Calif., that the document be submitted to the Holy See and not be published until any changes suggested by the Vatican are incorporated.

The committee rejected the suggestion as unnecessary, saying there was nothing in the document in the way of new teaching or legislation, norms or prescriptions that would require Vatican review or approval.

Swiss Guard to mark 500th anniversary the Vatican and in Switzerland, marking the first Vatican-Swiss stamp package.

Also in anticipation of the anniversary, a history of the Guard written by Sgt. Christian-Roland Marcel Richard was released Nov. 9.

Col. Elmar Mader, commander of the Guard, said Richard's work marked the first time that an active guard published a book describing life in the corps.

Precise as the watches of his homeland, Richard said it took him 2,962 hours to write the book when he was not guarding the entrances to the Vatican, protecting the pope, working crowd control, continuing his training or performing ceremonial duties at Masses and visits from heads of state.

In addition to the history of the Swiss Guard, the book includes a chapter on the rules governing the recruitment, training and discipline of the corps.

The current Guard has 110 male Swiss citizens, all of whom are Catholic. They must have an impeccable reputation, be under age 30, unmarried when they begin their service and have served in the Swiss Army.

Marching strong

Unveiling plans for the anniversary celebration during a Nov. 22 press conference,

Mader — flanked by two guards in their traditional tri-colored uniforms — said Pope Julius chose the Swiss mercenaries because of the Swiss "passion for war and, especially, for their respect for the church."

"The pontiff wanted to be able to count on a well-prepared corps of guards which would safeguard him at critical moments and which could become the permanent nucleus of a larger army to be formed in case of necessity," Mader said.

Between April 7 and May 4, more than 100 former guards will march from Switzerland to Rome, following the route taken by their predecessors in 1506.

The march was timed to allow the former guards to participate in the key moment of the anniversary celebration — a memorial Mass and swearing in of new members on the May 6 anniversary of the fall of 147 guards, killed in action in 1527 while protecting Pope Clement VII during the sack of Rome.

Those in uniform

Mader was asked if any thought had been given to changing the uniform of the guards, particularly after Richard's book definitively laid to rest the legend that Michelangelo designed the costume.

"It is not up to me to change the uniform of the Swiss Guard, which dates from the Renaissance and which the whole world recognizes," he said.

Col. Elmar Mader, commander of the Swiss Guard, stands in his dress uniform on the hill above St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican. Mader said a new book detailing the history of the Guard marked the first time an active guard published a book describing life in the corps.

The commander also was asked — and not for the first time — whether the Guard ever would include women.

"I cannot imagine that we ever would have women in service," he said. "We live in a very small barracks, and there would not be room for women."

"The men are young," he said, "and I would not want to recruit problems" for discipline.

"Obviously, women are capable of providing security services. That is not the point. It is a matter of discipline," he said.

Mader said his men have a variety of reasons for seeking a place in the corps.

"It is a mix of motivations, although you will find in all of them a certain religious sensitivity" and a desire to serve the church, he said.

While there is a sense of prestige and honor in being a guard, Mader said, "it is not like it was 30 years ago, when a guard would return home and be seen as one of the pope's men."

A different journey

Author sees 'Christ the Lord' series as her 'life's work'

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Anne Rice

WASHINGTON — Even before "Christ the Lord: Out of Egypt" had made its appearance on The New York Times' hardcover fiction best-seller list, its author, Anne Rice, had come a long way toward completing a follow-up novel.

She envisions four books in all, telling the story of Jesus all the way through to his ascension into heaven.

"It's becoming my life's work," said Rice, 64, best known for her "Vampire Chronicle" novels.

"This is the consuming passion," Rice said in a telephone interview Nov. 21 with Catholic News Service.

While promoting "Christ the Lord," Rice, who was born Catholic, has talked freely about her decades spent as an atheist, and her return to Catholicism in 1998.

She said that she sees her atheism as "part of the journey" she had to take to get to the faith she embraces today.

"My earlier books, they were all part of the search for God, part of the conversation between God and the devil, finding the meaning of good and evil in the world," Rice said.

Those novels' characters, she added, were "a reflection of who I was for years: seeking, searching down dark, dark corridors."

Rice finds her atheism was nuanced.

"I never met any atheist who thought we were just here to have a good time," she recalled. "I think most of us felt we were facing reality. We thought of religious people as deluded, people who needed mythology to get through life. We had to be the ones to make things better."

"I had a few more spiritual questions than many of them had," Rice said. "I was never totally convinced. I was afraid there would be no God, but (did) not (believe) 'there was no God.'"

Her turnaround began while reading "the story of the Jews in history, thinking there was no explanation for the survival of these people," Rice said. The process continued with what she called "more reading, studying, pondering."

Rice said, "I felt I was running and (God) saw me, saying, 'I'm coming after you. It's not going to be enough. You're not going to find any peace without me.' By the end of 1998, I felt I was obsessed."

One example Rice gave that, regardless of where she was, when she turned on the television, "it would be on EWTN and there would be a priest saying Mass. It was uncanny. Here I am, this atheist, and I'd sit back in my easy chair watching the priest delivering his homily for an hour."

Rice rejects the notion that "Christ the Lord" is a refutation or recanting of her earlier books.

"I think of it more as finding what I had to do, finding my realization that that's what I was being prepared for all these years, part of a search," she said.

She does not read much other fiction, apart from the Brontes and Dickens.

However, "I'm certainly reading (C.S.) Lewis with new eyes," Rice said. "I'm very much committed to the idea of lay witness. We who believe in Christ have to witness in our own way. We have to tell the Christian story over and over again."

"I'm intrigued by how (Lewis) became such a powerful and influential witness. I'm moved by his power and his simplicity and his simple eloquence," she said.

Rice said her first brush with Lewis was in the 1950s as a child.

"My mother was reading 'The Screwtape Letters' and was knocked out by it," said Rice.

Much more recently, she added, "I read 'Mere Christianity' by C.S. Lewis and I was completely knocked out. That's more my kind of reading."

God is our light in the dark

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Hurley Whittaker, a former coal miner, possessed a keen wit and a faith that knew no bounds. Like other people who spend their lives in jobs where catastrophe and death are just around the corner, my grandfather was a master storyteller.

When I was little I tagged along while he went about his daily chores. No matter what he was doing, it would be fun for me because he would tell me stories or silly jokes.

Sometimes, however, he would talk about working deep in the ground in utter darkness. These were heart-stopping stories about courage, superstition and faith.

My grandfather had a jagged scar on his forehead that was the source of my favorite story from his coal mining days. He was digging on his knees when the ceiling of the tunnel collapsed. Hurt and bleeding, he lay in complete darkness.

At this point in the story, I always would ask him about being scared. For me being caught in the dark was the ultimate terror of my young life.

I never have forgotten his answer: He told himself he eventually would see the light of someone coming to get him. It would be the light of a fellow miner or the light of an angel.

Either way, someone would come to take him home.

As we begin this second full week of December, darkness falls sooner each day. Even in light-polluted cities, the short days leave their mark on us.

In John's Gospel the imagery of light and darkness helps us understand the astonishing miracle of God's sending Jesus into our world. In today's reading, John the Baptist differentiates between Jesus and himself, describing himself as one who is testifying to the "light" and preparing for Jesus' arrival.

We, like John the Baptist, must prepare for the coming of the light, but ours is a twofold mission. Right now we are consumed with preparing to celebrate the birth of Jesus.

However, the larger task challenges us to live our lives so that we may be prepared to celebrate the Second Coming with the risen Christ, the eternal light who will come to take us home.

HONORING GREATNESS

Made-for-TV movie about Pope John Paul II might get Golden Globe

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — The made-for-TV movie, "A Man Who Became Pope," may get a Golden Globe nomination, said the film's Italian producer, Pietro Valsecchi.

The movie and television awards, run by the Hollywood Foreign Press Association, will be presented Jan. 16 with the nominations announced Dec. 13.

Valsecchi told Catholic News Service he heard hints that his movie about the early life of the late Pope John Paul II may have a chance at a Golden Globe nomination.

Even though a nomination "would be a miracle," it would also reflect the great success the film had in Poland, Italy and the United States, he said.

The movie, which aired in August on cable's Hallmark Channel in the United States, was based on the Vatican-approved book, "Stories of Karol: The Unknown Life of John Paul II," by Gian Franco Sviderecoschi.

According to the Vatican, Pope John Paul had seen the movie in its entirety during a private viewing before his death April 2. Valsecchi said the pope was only able to see the film's first rough cut, which had no musical score.

"I had a feeling I wouldn't get this film finished in time for the pope to see it," he said.

After Valsecchi sent the Vatican a rough cut of the movie on DVD in early December, Msgr. Pawel Ptasznik, an official at the Vatican's Secretariat of State who served along with Cardinal Roberto Tucci as Vatican consultants to the filmmakers, called Valsecchi asking him to send a VHS copy of the film "because they didn't have a DVD" player.

Soon after, Msgr. Ptasznik and Cardinal Tucci told Valsecchi their names could be associated with the film and listed in the credits, which for Valsecchi meant "the pope saw himself" as being accurately represented in the fictionalized version of his early life and "accepted the film."

After the viewing, Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said the late pope "was very impressed" with the film's portrayal.

The two-and-a-half-hour film portrays the late pope's early life, starting with Nazi Germany's 1939 invasion of Poland, followed by the communist repression and ending with his 1978 election as pope.

At the May 19 showing of the finished film at the Vatican, Pope Benedict XVI commended the film's focus on Karol's early heroism for "reviving in every right-minded person the duty to do what he or she can so that such inhuman barbarism never happens again."

Valsecchi said Pope Benedict requested a copy of the film for the Vatican.

"So I made 200 collector's edition DVDs for the Vatican," he said.

A Golden Globe nomination would be a great honor and give greater exposure to a film that, he said, "offers a very important message in these times of war."

As pope and in his early life, Karol Wojtyla is "a model for young people to be open to the world, to care for the least and defenseless," said Valsecchi. "It's very important Karol's example seep in" today's society "in order to carry his message forward" and keep it alive.

CCHS junior wins new scholarship

CHARLOTTE — Andy Tinson, a junior at Charlotte Catholic High School, was named the first recipient of a new scholarship.

Andy received the Gregory Bazluki Sr. Memorial Scholarship, named for a longtime Charlotte Catholic assistant football coach who passed away recently.

The award is dedicated to those who give back to their school community through volunteer athletic service and includes a plaque and a $1,500 scholarship to Charlotte Catholic.

Andy received the award before the opening kickoff of the Charlotte Catholic homecoming game versus West Mecklenburg High School Oct. 21.

Ranked in the top 15 percent of his class, Andy is actively involved with the high school's sports medicine program, which helps provide care and rehabilitation to the school athletes.

"The scholarship is intended for someone who gives back to the Charlotte Catholic High School community through athletic service and represents the volunteerism that is promoted by the school and Christian, Catholic teachings," said Marjorie Bazluki, Gregory Bazluki's daughter.

"This is a tremendous honor for Andy," said Al Tinson, Andy's father.

"He puts a lot of effort into his role as a student athletic trainer at Charlotte Catholic and we are grateful to the Bazluki family for this recognition for him," said Tinson. "And I think it is a wonderful tribute to Coach Bazluki that his family has chosen to honor him in a way that will keep his memory in the forefront of the Charlotte Catholic community in the years ahead."

Lasting spirit

Holy Angels honors resident, employees at banquet

BELMONT — As a prelude to the 50th anniversary of Holy Angels and the 50th birthday of its first resident, Maria Morrow, Holy Angels announced the establishment of the Maria T. Morrow Spirit Award.

Regina Moody, Holy Angels president and CEO, presented the award to Morrow during the Holy Angels 17th annual employee awards banquet held in Belmont Nov. 19.

Moody said Morrow was being recognized for a number of honorable traits, including her "spirit, ... commitment to making a difference, encouragement and determination."

Morrow's life and example have made an impact on the lives of the families and their children who are residents at Holy Angels, which was founded in 1956 by the Sisters of Mercy. The non-profit corporation provides services to children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation, some of whom have physical disabilities and are medically fragile.

Morrow, who was born Dec. 20, 1955, with multiple disabilities, was not expected to live; if she did, doctors expected her to have serious medical problems, severe retardation and physical disabilities.

Morrow's young mother sought help from the Sisters of Mercy, who operated a day care center under the direction of Mercy Sister Marie Patrice Manley. When Morrow became seriously ill, her mother asked the sisters to care for her child.

Each sister took turns caring for the infant Maria, who began to thrive with their attention and medical care. She grew and developed far better than expected. Soon, other parents of children with multiple disabilities and mental retardation asked the Sisters of Mercy for help.

The sisters set up the home that eventually became Holy Angels.

At the banquet, Holy Angels presented 10 employees with the Achievement of Excellence Award that recognizes outstanding job performance. The winners, who were nominated by fellow staff members, were: Shelia Boyden, Dawn Ford, Fannie Rendleman, Keith Roper, Deborah Adams, Laura Shive, Barbara Haley, Patsy Kell and Justin Maulden.

Also, Don Shew, who serves on the Holy Angels Foundation board of directors, received the Dr. C. Ellis Fisher Caring Hands, Caring Heart Award, which recognizes distinction, excellence, commitment, generosity and vision.

Fisher, for whom the award is named, currently serves as Holy Angels medical director, a position he has held for more than 25 years.

Holy Angels will officially begin its 50th year with the dedication and official opening of the fifth intermediate care facility on Dec. 20.

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION SUPPORT

Be a Champion-in-Christ

"To such as these does the Kingdom of God belong."

Matthew 19:14

Even though the Christians of the Holy Land are directly descended from the first Christians converted by the Apostles:

- They are in a desperate struggle to survive as a community.
- They are isolated from the rest of Christendom.
- They are down to only 2% of the population from 18% in 1948.
- They are suffering from overt discrimination and their economy is being destroyed, and their children are stigmatized in the public schools.

The Catholic Schools play an integral role in preserving the Christian heritage of the Holy Land.

The Catholic Archbishop of Jerusalem, the Latin Patriarch Michel Sabbah, recognizes this need and supports the parochial school system to educate all native Christian Children of the Holy Land.

A gift from you will help educate a child in the Catholic School system. It takes only $25 per month or an annual gift of $300 to assure the primary and secondary education of a Christian child in the Holy Land.

"It is essential that we, as Christians in the Diocese of Charlotte, reach out to our brothers and sisters in the Holy Land at this time of great need. By sponsoring a child for Christian education, we can help ensure the presence of the original Christians and actively contribute to the continuity of our Christian heritage."

The holidays for those who live alone

Solitude allows 'ownership' of life, guided by God

During the holidays I hear again from friends who live alone how lonely they feel at this time of year. I relate to what they are saying with empathy.

People live alone for many reasons. Some choose this lifestyle, but for many it is a situation imposed on them: A spouse dies, a child moves away.

Most of the time we don't think about the days to come when we will be without companionship in our home. Then that day arrives. We no longer have loved ones to talk with, eat with, quarrel with, pray with, work or laugh with.

We face a turning point and an at-first unknown future, but one that definitely will be different.

I went through this lifestyle change when all my children left home as they entered adulthood. I remember sometimes walking from room to room, feeling a loneliness that almost defied description.

I still had my job to go to every day, and that was good. It kept me too busy to keep focusing on my loneliness.

But the emptiness was there, and the quiet. I had no one to cook for, or argue with, or listen to. In all honesty, I think I felt my best usefulness was at an end.

Of course, living alone is not a situation unique to only few of us. In fact, 28 million Americans live alone. That information is found in a new book I grabbed recently because the title caught my attention, "A Party of One, Meditations for Those Who Live Alone," by Joni Woelfel. The best part of the book was the spirit of it.

Woelfel says it bluntly: "As in all stations in life, the unique dynamics of living alone bring their own challenges, lessons, joys and rewards."

Woelfel's situation arrived unexpectedly. After many years of marriage, and especially having to survive the suicide of a beloved son, she was given the surprising and terrifying news from her husband that he was leaving her.

They subsequently reconciled. But she learned so much from that time when she was suddenly thrust into aloneness that she found herself writing about it.

I found it amazing that she could stay so positive, actually even upbeat, when her life so sadly had plunged her into aloneness. When you have to live alone "for whatever reason," she tells readers, you can "take ownership" of your life if you remain confident that you are being guided and "upheld by God."

A word she speaks many times is "empowerment," and she tells how she found ways to get comfort, inspiration and eventually wisdom in her new and sudden situation of living alone.

Often I felt myself relating to her situation. One chapter, in particular, where she talks about getting sick with influenza, brought back memories.

She writes, "As a person living alone, there was no one to bring me chicken soup, a cup of tea or a word of encouragement." I could relate, especially when she admits so honestly there was nothing she could do "but float with the experience."

Yet, this somehow, paradoxically, gave her a sense of peace knowing she "was in God's hands, come what may."

Woelfel's advice was what I have learned — that those of us who live alone must take "ownership" for our lives, "confident in being guided and upheld by God."

Remembering that, we all can rejoice in this holiday season.

Pope urges world to continue its fight against HIV/AIDS

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — As the number of people affected by HIV/AIDS continues to rise, Pope Benedict XVI urged the world to persevere in its fight against the disease and offer needed assistance to those hit by the virus.

On the eve of the Dec. 1 World AIDS Day, the pope made the special appeal at the end of his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square.

The U.N.-sponsored day "aims to draw attention to the scourge of AIDS and invite the international community to a renewed commitment in the field of prevention and supportive assistance for those" affected by the virus, said the pope.

Approximately 40 million people live with HIV, and nearly 5 million people were infected by the virus in 2004 alone, according to figures released by UNAIDS, the joint U.N. program on HIV/AIDS. More than 3 million people died last year because of AIDS, it said.

Calling the latest statistics alarming, the pope expressed his solidarity with those suffering from AIDS and their families.

He encouraged the people who worked through "the many initiatives dedicated to overcoming this disease," especially the work carried out by the church.

"Closely following Christ's example, the church has always considered healing the sick an integral part of its mission," he said.

Some 23,000 pilgrims gathered under drizzling rain in St. Peter's Square for the pope's first general audience for the season of Advent.

The pope dedicated his catechesis to Psalm 137, recalling the exile of the Jews and their enslavement by the Babylonians.

He said the psalmist's image of the Jews weeping for their destroyed city of Jerusalem while in the hands of their captors "by the streams of Babylon" was "almost a symbolic foreshadowing of the extermination camps" of the last century which were "an infamous operation of death that remain a permanent disgrace in the history of humanity."

Even though the psalmist expresses a longing for violent revenge against the Babylonians, the pope said, "God, who is the ultimate judge of history, will know ... how to read and receive even the cries of the victims beyond the bitter tones they carry at times."

He said St. Augustine taught that "even among the people of Babylon, there are people who work for peace and the good of the community" even though they may not believe in the God of the Bible.

God will lead these people of good will "toward the heavenly Jerusalem, rewarding them for their pure conscience," said the pope.

Though they may not know God, they possess "a sparkle of desire for the unknown and transcendent" which is "a form of faith" or belief in hope, he said.

This faith and longing for the transcendent is "really a journey toward the real Jerusalem (in heaven) and toward Christ," said the pope in remarks apart from his text.

The pope reminded Christians to remain open to God and the transcendent and to "not always become attached to material things and the here and now, but to be on the path toward God."

Our Advent protagonist: St. John the Baptist

This season, we must ready ourselves for Jesus' coming

"Prepare a way for the Lord, make straight his path!"

Whose voice was this crying out in the desert? It was that of St. John the Baptist, who wore a garment of camel-skin and lived on locusts and wild honey, according to St. Mark's Gospel.

As we continue our journey through Advent, we see that St. John's message is not really easy. John did not make things easy for people. He called for radical change, not a superficial one.

Change, as we know it, is uncomfortable; it requires work and determination.

Have you ever done any painting? Not the kind of painting such as by Leonardo da Vinci or Pablo Picasso, but the ordinary painting of a wall, window or chair. If you have ever painted the proper way, you know that the most important, tedious and exhausting part is not applying the paint. It is preparing the surface to be painted: sanding, cleaning, scraping. Only then, after much work, can we paint.

Advent is like painting. You cannot apply new paint if the surface is not ready. Sometimes blaming society, the world or others is an easy way out, but the Gospel speaks to me and to you personally — John the Baptist is talking to us, as uncomfortable as it may seem.

He is the messenger, the prophet; he is not a fortune teller, spending time in horoscopes and palm readings. The prophet is the one who speaks for God to us.

Guess what — we are supposed to be prophets. The Gospel reminds us: "Be on your guard, stay awake" (Mk.13:33). Spiritually, we have no time to sleep or to get tired. Time has a unique quality — if it is not used properly, it is lost for ever.

I read in a magazine once the following statistics: No matter how tired we may be, our exhaustion is fully justified, as can be proven by simple arithmetic. The United States has a population of some 200 million. Of these, 72 million are past retirement age, leaving 128 million in the work force.

When you subtract the 75 million people who are either too young or still in school, you get 53 million left to do the work. There are 24 million employed by the federal government, which leaves only 29 million in the work force.

Subtract from that 12 million in the military and the work force is down to 17 million.

Another 15,765,000 are in state and municipal offices; 520,000 in hospitals and mental institutions, and this reduces the work force to 715,000.

Of these, 462,000 are vagrants without jobs, leaving only 253,000 in the work force.

But there are 252,998 people incarcerated, leaving just two people — you and me! No wonder we are tired and burned out!

In our feverish activity of the busiest season of the year, we make a common and big mistake: we don't control the activity, the activity controls us. The Gospel guides us as it warns us to be awake and to be alert.

Yes, it is very healthy and peaceful to be awake to our loving process and to be alert to his message of faith and hope. The perfect image of this paradox is the running water, always clear, healthy and flowing, and yet still peaceful and joyful. In fact, what an inner peace you experience just watching for a few minutes the running water of a river or stream or the waves of the ocean.

In John's Gospel, there is an episode in which the first words spoken by "some Greeks" to the disciple Philip are, "Sir, we wish to see Jesus" (Jn.12:21). That is indeed the most sincere desire of our hearts: we wish to see Jesus and encounter him on a one to one relationship.

This Advent, let us prepare the surface and stay alert for Jesus' coming.

Generosity, the true nobility

The Human Side

FATHER

TO BE GENEROUS IS TO BE GODLIKE

"September's collection was for the victims of Katrina and Rita. It was followed by collections for earthquake victims and then by the Cardinal's Appeal! We're tapping out," someone said recently.

Numerous national disasters and the rising costs of recovery from them may leave us wondering when the limits of our giving will be reached.

In Latin, the word generous means "of noble birth," and the word noble means having elevated or high character. We don't have to be born into high-class nobility to be noble. Being noble implies that we believe in elevating the well-being of others and act to do something about this.

Nobility is selflessness. The noble person is the opposite of a self-centered miser.

Being a generous giver, however, goes beyond having noble character. To be truly generous requires imitating Christ incarnate, who divested himself of his divine powers to become one of us. Not only did Christ do all of that, but he took the form of a slave as well.

To show his enormous love, he died on the cross, literally pouring himself out whole and entire for us.

Ultimately, to be generous is to be Godlike by pouring ourselves out as Christ did. It often implies that we die to certain things that we love and cherish.

Christians who truly have poured themselves out for others are among our canonized saints. The contributions they made to society were awesome and often were considered beyond human imagination. Take, for example, the work of Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta in modern times.

When we honestly reflect on all the resources at our disposal, it leaves us with the feeling of being truly blessed. When the spirit of Christ's generosity and that of the saints takes hold of us, its nobility and inspiration override fears that we'll be tapped out, replacing them with a heartfelt desire to dig deep into our pockets for the unfortunate.

No doubt about it, many of us already are tightening our belts to the point of suffocating. If we live as noble Christians, however, we won't suffocate.

In fact, we will breathe a new, refreshing, intoxicating air.

At the end of the movie "Schindler's List," Schindler decries the fact that he could have done more to save Jewish lives.

We have been blessed more than we realize. We become even more blessed when we give to those who have less than us. More often than not, we don't miss what we have given.

Vatican II: 40 years later

An anniversary worthy of our attention

Dec. 8 marks the 40th anniversary of the Second Vatican Council's closing. During that gathering — the 21st ecumenical council in church history — more than 2,500 of the world's bishops approved 16 documents designed to enliven Catholic spirituality and make the church far more relevant to the modern world.

The most challenging and prophetic of these documents was the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World. It is arguably the most important document in the rich tradition of Catholic social teaching.

To label a document of an ecumenical council "pastoral" was in itself unique. The pastoral nature of this document meant that it was calling the Catholic world to serve the larger world — above all to serve humanity's suffering masses.

Its very first words powerfully illustrate this call: "The joys and the hopes, the griefs and anxieties of the men of this age, especially those who are poor or in any way afflicted, these too are the joys and hopes, the griefs and anxieties of the followers of Christ."

While speaking on behalf of the world's poor, hungry, war-torn and unborn, the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World confronts the well-off and powerful. It challenges individuals; governments and corporations to turn from selfishness and seek the common good, saying:

"In many instances there exists a pressing need to reform economic and social structures. ... There must be an abolition of excessive desire for profit, nationalistic pretensions, the lust for political domination, militaristic thinking. ...

"Some nations with a majority of Christians have an abundance of this world's goods, while others are deprived of the necessities of life and are tormented with hunger, disease and every kind of misery. This situation must not be allowed to continue, to the scandal of humanity."

The world's Catholic bishops courageously confronted an increasing war mentality. They taught that the accumulation of weapons does not build genuine peace, it threatens it, and it does nothing to address the causes of war, such as economic inequalities.

Their document says: "The arms race is an utterly treacherous trap for humanity, and one which injures the poor to an intolerable degree."

Pressing forward, the bishops urged us to think outside the box. They said, "Let us find means for resolving our disputes in a manner worthy of man.

Making a Difference

TONY MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

Divine Providence urgently demands of us that we free ourselves from the age-old slavery of war."

While many nations were preparing to launch full-scale war on the unborn and newly born, the council fathers declared, "From the moment of its conception, life must be guarded with the greatest care, while abortion and infanticide are unspeakable crimes."

Four decades have passed since the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World was approved, and the world largely has ignored its critical messages. Countless Catholics have also ignored these authoritative teachings.

How many more lives must be sacrificed to the gods of war, greed and indifference before we — especially the disciples of Jesus — stand up and cry out: "No more!"

At Vatican II's final public session, Pope Paul VI summed it all up with these inspiring words: "On the face of every human being, especially when marked by tears and sufferings, we can and must see the face of Christ, the son of man."

Holy Family Church a home for many Catholics in Forsyth County

In 1976, the significant growth of St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem prompted the Diocese of Charlotte to purchase 10 acres of land to build a new church in Clemmons. At the same time, a home on the corner of Knob Hill Avenue and Peace Haven Road was purchased as a rectory and also served as a chapel for weekday Mass, office and meeting space and religious education classes.

Father James Solari, assigned to St. Leo the Great Church at the time, served as resident priest of what was known then as the Clemmons mission during the years 1977-78. Father John Vianney Hoover arrived to replace Father Solari at what was becoming known as "St. Leo's West" from 1978-79.

The first Mass was celebrated July 15, 1978 in the Clemmons Presbyterian Church by Msgr. Richard Allen, then-pastor of St. Leo the Great Church. While they had generously offered their hospitality, after two weekends of Masses, Catholics were overflowing their facility.

For the next five years, the Saturday evening Mass and religious education classes were held at the Clemmons Moravian Church and Sunday morning Masses were held at the Clemmons Vogler Funeral Home Chapel.

Paulist Father Robert Scott became the first pastor of Holy Family Church as a parish on Aug. 15, 1980, with St. Francis of Assisi Church in Mocksville named as its mission. Then-Bishop Michael J. Begley canonically established the parish under the patronage of the Holy Family.

The name was one of the choices proposed by the parishioners and was chosen based on the "Year of the Family." In that same year the first building committee was created with 170 registered families. Pastors succeeding Father Scott included Fathers Tom Clements, Cecil Tice, Tom Walsh, Frank J. O'Rourke and the current pastor, Father Michael Buttner.

In April 1981, plans were under way to build a 9,200-square-foot structure comprised of a worship area, reconciliation room, offices, nursery, kitchen and a concourse for social events, classes and overflow of the worship area. The following year, parish registration had grown to 329 families.

Bishop Begley conducted a groundbreaking ceremony for the new church building March 4, 1984 and the first Mass was celebrated in the new building in December. Parish registration had then grown to 550 registered families.

Then-Bishop John F. Donoghue dedicated the new Holy Family Church building March 10, 1985, his first dedication as Bishop of Charlotte.

A youth center was constructed in 2002 to provide space for a variety of youth-oriented educational and organization functions. Sunday evening classes are conducted there for the youth ministry program. These programs help the parish meet the spiritual and educational needs of middle and high school youths.

By 2002, Holy Family Church was home to more than 1,500 registered families. Overcrowded Masses, lack of classroom space for faith formation programs and cramped office space inspired a plan to accommodate the continuing growth.

In September 2002, a capital campaign was initiated to raise $3.2 million dollars to build a new church that will seat more than 1,200 parishioners and open up much-needed space for the growing faith formation programs.

On June 5, 2004 a new chapter in the history of Holy Family Church began at a groundbreaking ceremony for the new church. On Nov. 27, 2005, Bishop Peter J. Jugis celebrated the dedication Mass for the new Holy Family Church.

The new facility will support the growth of the parish and ensure adequate space for the worship and ministerial needs of the parish for many years to come. This day became a reality because of the hard work and generosity of Holy Family parishioners.

TEARS OF SUBSTANCE

CNS PHOTOS FROM REUTERS

No church inquiry, for now, into statue of Mary some say is weeping

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (CNS) — The Diocese of Sacramento has no plans to investigate an alleged apparition in which a statue of the Virgin Mary outside a Catholic church has been reported to weep blood.

The statue has drawn hundreds of visitors to Vietnamese Catholic Martyrs Church in Sacramento since parishioners first noticed reddish streaks near the eyes of the white concrete statue in mid-November.

Father James Murphy, rector of Blessed Sacrament Cathedral, said he had discussed the matter with Sacramento Bishop William K. Weigand and told local media that the diocese was "letting it sit for now."

An inquiry involving field investigators and lab analysts could be initiated later, Father Murphy said, if the phenomenon continues.

"There's no rush," he told The Sacramento Bee newspaper. "The church thinks in terms of centuries, not tomorrow's news."

In Catholic teaching, an apparition is a supernatural manifestation of God, an angel or a saint to an individual or group of individuals. Church investigations into reported apparitions usually focus on the moral, spiritual and psychological character of the visionary or visionaries, the consistency of any messages with church teachings and other spiritual effects connected with the event.

If the church makes an affirmative judgment on an alleged apparition, it says it is "worthy of belief," but it does not require Catholics to accept any such private revelations as a matter of faith.

Bush, Rice urged to protect poor in trade negotiations

U.S. bishops seek to work with government

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Religious leaders' concerns that trade agreements take into account the effects of globalization on the poor were the topic of meetings Dec. 1 between religious leaders, President George W. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

In the first meeting, Washington Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick met with Bush at the White House. He then joined an interfaith delegation of a dozen religious leaders at the State Department to encourage Rice to push for trade agreements that will reduce hunger and poverty in the developing world.

After his White House meeting, Cardinal McCarrick said he encouraged the president to protect the interests of the poor around the world who have too little access to the negotiating table.

Of particular concern as the World Trade Organization's Dec. 13-

18 conference on trade approached was the emphasis on agricultural policies in that part of the Doha Round of negotiations. The ongoing round of trade talks carries the name of the site of the original meeting in Doha, Qatar, in November 2001.

"President Bush has proposed major changes in the U.S. agricultural policies that are important for establishing a more just global trading system," Cardinal McCarrick said, adding that it was "a courageous and necessary step in the right direction."

However, he added, the U.S. bishops' conference would seek to work with the administration and Congress to see that reforms in the next U.S. agriculture funding bill "substantially reduce, if not eliminate, trade-distorting federal subsidies while protecting small and medium-sized farms in the United States."

Culture of disbelief among threats to religious freedom, says pope

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said religious freedom is threatened in parts of the world, sometimes by religious and political factors and sometimes by a prevailing culture of disbelief.

The pope made the remarks at his Sunday blessing Dec. 4, speaking to thousands of pilgrims in St. Peter's Square.

He noted that 40 years ago the Second Vatican council issued its Declaration on Religious Freedom ("Dignitatis Humanae"), which said religious freedom is a right that stems from the dignity of each person.

The council, the pope said, was reaffirming traditional church teaching that every person, as a spiritual being, has the right and duty to seek the truth and that religious freedom must be given to each individual and community.

"After 40 years, this teaching of the council remains of great relevance today," the pope said.

"In fact, religious liberty is far from being effectively guaranteed everywhere: In some cases, it is denied for religious or ideological reasons; at other times, although recognized on paper, is it obstructed in reality by political power or, in a more deceitful way, by the cultural domination of agnosticism and relativism," he said.

"Let us pray that every person can fully realize the religious vocation that he carries inscribed in his being," he said.

The pope did not name countries where religious freedom is not respected, but recent publicized cases have involved Catholics in China.

Three days before the pope made his remarks, the Vatican strongly condemned the beating of several nuns in central China and the continued arrests of underground Catholic priests.

Pope, Palestinian prime minister discuss peace process, challenges

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In Pope Benedict XVI's first meeting with Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, the two leaders discussed the Middle East peace process and the difficulties Palestinian Christians face in the territories.

At the end of a private audience Dec. 3 in the Vatican, the Palestinian leader also invited the pope to visit the Holy Land, saying the pontiff would "be very welcome in Jerusalem and all the holy places."

The pope thanked Abbas for the invitation while another member of the Palestinian entourage gave the pope a special entry permit for the West Bank town of Bethlehem.

The Palestinian minister of tourism, Ziad al-Bandak, told the pope that the document was a gift from the people of Bethlehem and that it made the pontiff an honorary citizen of the town where Jesus was born.

During the "cordial meeting" the pope and Abbas surveyed "the situation in the Middle East," according to Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls.

"In particular, the need to integrate all segments of the Palestinian people in the peace process was underlined," Navarro-Valls said, and "the difficulties of Catholics in Palestine and their contribution to Palestinian society" were also discussed.

Abbas told reporters after the meeting that the pope could play an important part in promoting peace in the Middle East. With his "symbolic weight in the international community," the pope "can carry out a decisive role for peace," he said.

Abbas said Christians in Bethlehem "live in difficult conditions" and are under "various kinds of pressure" which "impel them to leave their land."

The pope also received a formal invitation to visit Israel when he met with Israeli President Moshe Katsav in a private audience in November.

It marked the 1,000th execution in the United States since the Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty nearly 30 years ago.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM IS KEY, VATICAN OFFICIAL TELLS FOREIGN MINISTERS

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Freedom of religion is key for creating peaceful coexistence and respect in today's multiethnic and multicultural communities, a top Vatican official told European foreign ministers.

Archbishop Giovanni Lajolo, the Vatican's foreign minister, said "human rights are not negotiable."

"The Catholic Church reproves, as foreign to the mind of Christ, any discrimination against people or any harassment of them on the basis of their race, color, condition in life or religion," he said.

He made his comments Dec. 6 as head of the Vatican's delegation to the annual session of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe held Dec. 5-6 in Ljubljana, Slovenia.

The organization addresses European security issues and crisis management.

Efforts against prejudice and discrimination must be continued, he said.

"Concrete measures of assistance are needed to alleviate the suffering" of trafficked women and men or migrants and "to re-establish respect for their human dignity," Archbishop Lajolo said.

Lasting legacies

Catholic Heritage Society members honored

CHARLOTTE — Catholic Heritage Society members were honored recently.

Nearly 80 people attended the Mass celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte Nov. 20. A reception, dinner and individual photo sessions with the bishop followed.

The Catholic Heritage Society was formed in 1994 to recognize those who have indicated that they intend to leave gifts in their wills and estate plans to a parish, school, the Diocese of Charlotte, the diocesan Foundation or other Catholic organization in the diocese.

There are nearly 600 members of the society across the diocese, and many more Catholics have remembered entities of the diocese in their estate plans without disclosing that information.

"We appreciate the generosity of all our Catholic Heritage Society members who have demonstrated their love of the church with a legacy gift," said Judy Smith, director of planned giving for the diocese. "What a wonderful example of stewardship they provide for all of us."

Some gifts received from society members have been designated to the Foundation of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte. Currently the foundation has more than $12.8 million in assets.

Contributions may be designated for a specific parish, school, foundation or organization, or undesignated gifts to the Diocese of Charlotte, said Smith. Most of the 131 endowments in the foundation are designated for parishes.

"Through their gifts, members of the Catholic Heritage Society will leave a legacy that will help meet the needs of individuals in the Diocese of Charlotte for generations to come," said Jim Kelley, director of development for the diocese and executive director of the Foundation.

"More and more parishioners in the diocese are following the example society members by remembering the church in their current and estate plans," he said.

the live nativity originated by St. Francis in Greccio, Italy, in 1223. St. Francis had petitioned Pope Honorius III to allow him to stage the live nativity to show the villagers of Greccio the actual conditions under which Jesus was born.

Ruth Thoni, minister of the fraternity, said the reason they present the program each year is to remind people of the real "reason for the season," the true meaning of Christmas, and not the increasing commercialism of the holiday.

In addition to the nativity, the Secular Franciscans portray scenes from the life of St. Francis. This year, Brian Mulligan of the St. Joseph Church youth group led the St. Joseph Church choir, singing three songs to represent the conversion of the young St. Francis from soldier and knight to brother and follower of Christ.

St. Francis is "a great example of what we can do as servants if we are faithful to God," said Deacon Scott Gilfillan, permanent deacon at St. Joseph Church.

Twenty live animals were used in this year's re-enactment, so the production's reflections, songs and skits were frequently punctuated by the mooing of a cow, the bleating of a sheep or the braying of a donkey. Goats, horses and a llama made up the rest of the livestock.

Members of the Schell family have been participating in the program for all six years.

Colin and Neil Barrett played Pope Honorius III and Cardinal Ugolino. Olivia Marois, granddaughter of Brady and Linda Robinson, who are both secular Franciscans, filled in for the baby Jesus. Cristian Cabra played the part of Joseph.

The Secular Franciscans dedicated the program to two newly-professed members, Dr. James and Sue Taylor, as well as to the memory of Ellie Obrist, a member of the order who died this past March.

Combating poverty

Applications invited for local CCHD grants

$500 TO $5,000
AVAILABLE TO LOCAL ORGANIZATIONS

CHARLOTTE — The Catholic Campaign for Human Development in the Diocese of Charlotte is accepting grant applications for the 2006 funding year.

CCHD makes small grants from $500 to $5,000 to organizations without regard to religious affiliation. Applications must be postmarked by Feb. 15, 2006.

Established in 1970 as the U.S. bishops' domestic anti-poverty, social justice program, CCHD is a response to the biblical call for justice for those who are poor. Its mission is to address the root causes of poverty through the promotion and support of community-controlled, self-help organizations and education.

"CCHD was a program originally designed to alleviate poverty," said Terri Jarina, program director for parish social ministry for the Office of Justice and Peace, Catholic Social Services, and diocesan director for CCHD.

"Over time, the U.S. bishops realized poverty is a bigger problem than originally thought, and their focus shifted to breaking the cycle of poverty," she said.

The Diocese of Charlotte CCHD

Committee solicits programs and projects that:

- seek to affect the root causes of poverty in the target community;
- involve active participation of the people served in the planning and decision-making of the sponsoring organization;
- indicate potential for institutional change, empowerment of the people and community involved, and the development of local leadership;
- conform to Catholic social teaching.

"CCHD looks at how money awarded through grants can help keep people from sliding back into poverty," said Jarina.

WANT TO APPLY?

In order to apply for a CCHD grant, all applications must be postmarked by Feb. 15, 2006.

For more information or an application, contact Terri Jarina at (704) 370-3234. An application and sample grant are available on the Catholic Social Services Web site at www.cssnc.org/justicepeace.

To obtain the application as an e-mail attachment in an MS Word document, send an e-mail request to thjarina@charlottediocese.org.

More than 270 people attended the event, which also celebrated the 40th anniversary of the parish and 40 years in the priesthood for Oblate Father Joseph Zuschmidt, pastor. Abbot Placid Solari of Belmont Abbey blessed the meal that included 10 turkeys.

"Since I have attended Queen of the Apostles, this was the largest event we have hosted," said Walter Baranowski, a member of the parish council. "It was very well-received and enjoyed by all."

The local Knights of Columbus presented Father Zuschmidt with a plaque in appreciation for his service to the parish and community.

"It was indeed a day of gratitude," said Father Zuschmidt.

Dining with class

Hunger Banquet raises awareness, funds for hunger

BY CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — In the school gymnasium, “police” circulated among the second- and third-class diners, ready to “arrest” someone for the slightest infraction.

One officer carried a sign that read, “If you ask for rice, you’ll be arrested.”

Third-class, or lower-class, citizens, were seated on cardboard mats on the floor. Their meal consisted of two ounces of rice, the amount a refugee typically receives in a day. They stood in line for their allotment of rice and water, and were treated rudely by those providing the nourishment.

The dining experience was part of Asheville Catholic School’s Hunger Banquet, held at the school Nov. 9. The banquet gave students and their parents an idea of how people of the world eat, while it raised funds for impoverished people.

“The Hunger Banquet tries to make a tangible reminder of what the world situation is like,” said Father John Schneider, pastor of St. Eugene Church and administrator of Asheville Catholic School.

Last year’s banquet raised $500. This year’s banquet topped $1,100.

Manna Foodbank in Asheville, which distributes food to needy people in western North Carolina, received $100. The remainder went to Catholic Relief Services in Haiti.

Patrick Fidelia, a native of Haiti, spoke to the students and parents about what life is like for the poor in Haiti.

“What you are doing here is very important,” said Fidelia. “Don’t ever forget this night. It will make a lasting impression on your heart.”

Fifth-grade teacher Andrew Weatherly served as the banquet’s master of ceremonies, with fifth-grade students serving as both meal police and waiters, depending on what class area they were in.

Second-class citizens sat at tables and ate rice, beans, juice and water. They were not allowed seconds.

Only a few people were seated at the first-class tables, which had white tablecloths and came with a full meal consisting of lasagna. The fifth-grade waiters hovered nearby to fulfill their dining wishes.

Everyone paid the same amount for the meals.

Parent Ann Williams was a third-class citizen seated on the floor.

“I wanted to be at the table with the tablecloths. This isn’t what I was hoping for, but I’m (playing) a refugee from Bolivia, where my life is mining gold and silver,” said Williams.

Still hungry after finishing her allotment of rice and water, Williams said she had become more aware of what people in Third World countries have to endure.

Student Montana Weatherly was seated in the second-class section. He asked for salt, even though he knew that would get him arrested.

“It will be worth it, because when I get out, I’ll have salt,” he said.

Many diners were still hungry after finishing their small meals.

“Go beyond tonight,” said Fidelia to the group. “What do you have at home that you can give?”

Stepsisters meet husbands online

gious education at St. Stephen Church in Sanford in eastern North Carolina. The roommates instantly bonded with their shared love of the Catholic Church.

That same month, two stepsisters, Cheryl Turner and Jane Valencia, moved into a house in Charlotte. After being away from each other for more than a decade, they were eager to resume their relationship as close stepsisters.

Although 160 miles separated the two pairs, they all had been praying to find a spouse, especially to St. Raphael and Our Lady of Perpetual Help.

The quest begins

Jacome's cousin recommended a matchmaking Web site for Catholics. Jacome was hesitant at first, and Hanes said he would wait to see how things worked out for his roommate before exploring the world of Internet dating.

The Turner's mother, a third-order Carmelite, also encouraged them to try the Internet.

In early January 2004, Jacome, Valencia and Turner posted their profiles on the same Catholic dating site.

"I had always wanted to marry a theologian, or someone deeply involved in the Catholic Church," Turner said. Jacome's profile as an "ex-seminarian" intrigued her.

"I got an e-mail from Cheryl stating her interest in my seminary experience," Jacome said. They exchanged e-mails for a few days, and on Jan. 16, exactly one week after he posted his profile, Jacome nervously called Turner on her cell phone.

When Turner got the call from Jacome, she and Valencia were driving to Buies Creek, N.C. to visit their mother, just 25 miles from where Jacome and Hanes were living.

Jacome asked Turner to meet him that night.

"My reaction was, 'Can I bring my sister?'" said Turner.

"And my reaction was, 'Can I bring my roommate?'" Jacome said. Hanes reluctantly agreed to tag along on what was now a double blind date.

Soon the four young adults were in a pool hall, looking for each other, with no idea was their counterparts looked like, other than the clothing descriptions they had exchanged.

Guided by the Holy Spirit

While it wasn't love at first sight, the two couples instantly connected on a spiritual level. They all knew the same Catholic prayers and saints. Valencia recognized the medal Hanes wore as St. Benedict. Turner quizzed Jacome about his time in the seminary.

The four of them talked about their Catholic faith until 2 a.m.

Turner invited Jacome and Hanes to attend Mass with them the next day, but never called to confirm the plans.

"I thought 'rejected again,'" Jacome said.

Hanes' reaction was, "so much for that."

The stepsisters, however, thought nothing of the sort. After all these years, of running into dead-end relationships and not being able to find anyone "remotely faithful and spiritually mature," they had found two men with whom they were "in sync" on faith issues.

The next week, Turner e-mailed Jacome, asking Hanes to call her stepsister. At that point, Jacome was certain he had struck out.

Over the next two weeks, Turner and Jacome continued to talk via e-mail.

"Cheryl would write, 'Didn't Matt and Jane connect?' and I would say, 'Yeah, they connected really well,'" Jacome said laughingly.

Jacome said that as the "main communicators," he and Turner were more cautious in their conversations.

"But they really liked each other all along," Valencia said.

They all soon decided to go on another date. The men met the Turner's mother, Emmie, and attended Mass together.

"(Matt and I) both knew then that God was already strongly in our midst and the feeling of being blessed never left me the whole night," said Jacome. "Afterward, we had another awesome night of sharing our faith and our experiences."

Spiritual pairings

The two couples consider Mary and the Holy Spirit to be their guides throughout their dating experiences.

"The best thing we did was that we started praying early and often together," said Hanes.

"We always involved God in our dates: going to eucharistic adoration before dates and going on spiritual retreats," said Valencia.

Both couples agreed that double dating made the process easier; when one person ran out of things to say, there were three other people to keep the conversation going.

"It was great that God had all of us together in the beginning, because Matt and I are both shy," Valencia said.

"In the past, it always seemed so hard to be in a relationship," said Hanes. "But with Jane, it was just peaceful and easy."

Emmie Turner had been preparing her daughters for marriage since they each turned 15, teaching them about the importance of finding a holy spouse and having a holy marriage.

"We were amazed that we all looked at marriage as a way to bring each other to heaven," Jacome said. "In knowing that, a great trust was formed. To love a person so much to care for their soul as to desire heaven for them was our goal."

"Everything that we had in common, wasn't coincidence — it was the Holy Spirit," said Hanes.

Wedded bliss

As time grew on, it became clear the two couples were meant to be together. This became clearest to Hanes first. On March 30, 2004, only two-and-a-half months after they met, he proposed to Valencia.

They were married Sept. 4, 2004. Matt and Jane Hanes spent their honeymoon at the National Shrine of the Basilica of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, D.C. and at Catholic shrines in Emmitsburg, Md.

Turner decided to move out of the house to give the couple a home of their own. So she bought a house — next door to the one she and her sister had been sharing.

In December 2004, Jacome proposed in the adoration chapel at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte.

"I felt it only appropriate to get our Father in Heaven's blessing first," said Jacome.

Bryant and Cheryl Jacome were married July 9, 2005, and are expecting a baby in May 2006.

Both couples married at Sacred Heart Church in Dunn, N.C. — the church where they first attended Mass together. The Haneses are members at St. Patrick Cathedral, while the Jacomes split their time between St. Thomas Aquinas and Our Lady of the Assumption churches, all in Charlotte.

Several months after that first Mass they attended together, Emmie Turner shared something with her daughters.

She had sat behind the two couples, and during the Mass, Emmie Turner felt the presence of the Virgin Mary blessing Turner, Jacome, Valencia and Hanes.

"It is truly amazing what God has planned for you when you ask and say 'yes,'" said Jacome. "To be blessed to find spouses with such faith for the rest of our lives is tremendous, especially to know it is heavenly blessed."

Chronicling a legend

C.S. Lewis biographer sees boom in interest in writer's works, life

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — John Ryan Duncan was a C.S. Lewis fan before it was cool to be a C.S. Lewis fan.

Lewis has always had fans — none of the prolific Christian writer's books has ever gone out of print — but a bandwagon for him has begun to roll in anticipation of the Dec. 9 release of the movie "The Chronicles of Narnia: The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe," based on a Lewis novel.

Duncan filmed a documentary and wrote a companion book, both titled "The Magic Never Ends: The Life and Work of C.S. Lewis" and released in 2001. The documentary is getting played again on PBS stations throughout the country, and the book is being republished.

"The interest in C.S. Lewis is pretty astounding," Duncan said. "His readers are passionate readers — passionate not only about the content, but the entertainment value."

In a telephone interview with Catholic News Service, Duncan said that despite the research that went into the book and documentary, "I think it would be overreaching to say that I am capable of getting into the mind of C.S. Lewis."

Still, he gave it a try.

"While he (Lewis) was not an avid reader of current events — he was not someone who paid terribly close attention to world affairs — he had more of an epic sensibility about the nature of good and evil and the way those things played out in life and in literature," Duncan said.

"You're able to see that in a lot of his works. His life experiences, especially in World War I, really informed a lot of his work," Duncan said.

"The same with (J.R.R.) Tolkien, (a friend of Lewis'). I really think Tolkien's work was really impacted by World War I," he said. "They both understood the horrors of war, and so the themes of good and evil permeated their work."

Lewis embraced the use of allegory in his seven-book Narnia series, but only to a point, according to Duncan.

"A lot of people would look at 'The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe' and say, 'Oh, look, this is an allegory for the story of Christ.' Lewis himself said no, it's not an allegory, because there's no 1-to-1 ratio. 'This' is not really 'this,' 'that' is not exactly 'that,'" Duncan said.

"But he coined the phrase 'supposal,' and his version of that term, the way he defines it, is that 'The Chronicles of Narnia: The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe' is supposal," Duncan said.

"Suppose there was another land called Narnia, and suppose there was a character in Narnia named Aslan who had the characteristics of Christ, and suppose there were a story (with) elements in it that were similar to the story of Christ. That's how he gets away with the allegory."

To a non-Christian, the allegory is not overt, but the Christian reader sees "what Lewis wants you to see — the story of Christ," Duncan said, cautioning against any religious tradition appropriating Lewis for its own devices.

Lewis was raised an Anglican, became an atheist in young adulthood, and later renewed his belief in God — but professed Christianity without embracing the tenets of any one Christian religion.

"I am always afraid of C.S. Lewis being co-opted by any one denomination or any sect of any kind," Duncan said.

"I think C.S. Lewis speaks universally to people around the world and specifically to Christians," Duncan said. "I don't think he is any less relevant to evangelicals than he is to Catholics. He is equally relevant to both."

Lewis was a popular author in his native England, but he died in relative obscurity. On the day he died, the hugely popular Beatles released their second album in England. On the same day — Friday, Nov. 22, 1963 — President John Kennedy was assassinated.

Until Duncan's documentary no one had ever done a film biography of Lewis. In assembling material for the documentary, Duncan said there were apparently "no motion picture images of C.S. Lewis anywhere."

However, he got the cooperation of Douglas Gresham, Lewis' stepson, in making the film.

Gresham has worked with Lewis' estate since 1973, and assisted with the upcoming movie. Taking a cue from Lewis' own spirituality, Gresham became a minister; he and his wife operate a nondenominational Christian house of ministry that specializes in counseling and seminar hosting.

Like Mary, we are all called by God

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"Who, me?" is certainly the theme of this weekend's Gospel, as Mary is told she has been chosen by God for a special role in God's plan for the world.

Although we may not have the benefit of an angel bringing us the message (and we don't know how obvious this actually was to Mary either), many of us have been called by God to a specific mission at one time or another. Like Mary, our first reaction is: "Who, me? How could it be me?"

Here's how just such an incident played out with a couple of my friends.

Tim was chair of the church justice and peace committee. One day Elaine, a parishioner, telephoned him to say one of her children had met a newly arrived refugee student at school and learned that the family had nothing but the clothes in their suitcase.

They need food and basic furnishings, she said. "Is there something you can do?"

Tim, noting that he didn't have an organized, ready-made group for such a task, asked her, "Can you do something for them?"

"Me?" Elaine said, surprised.

She was very active in many ministries of the parish, but the justice and peace committee wasn't one of them.

"I mean our church needs to do something for them," she told Tim. "You're called to this. I'm not called to this."

"Did you find out about these people from your child?" Tim asked. "I'd say you've just been called."

So it goes. Even the most faithful people sometimes are surprised by a special call from God. Often, as it was with Mary and Elaine, we initially don't believe it because it doesn't fit our expectations or our image of ourselves.

God's call to Mary is a good reminder to us that God knows things about us that we don't know, and God has plans for us that are even greater than we can imagine. The hope is that our response will be the same as Mary's (and Elaine's, by the way): "Let it be done to me according to your word."

Questions:

When was a time you were called by God for a specific task or role that surprised you? How did you react? Why were you surprised?

Scripture to Illustrate:

"She was deeply troubled by his words, and wondered what his greeting meant" (Luke 1:29).

'Narnia' film worth visiting

BY DAVID DiCERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK (CNS) — It has taken more than 50 years for a live-action version of Christian author C.S. Lewis' beloved children's fantasy, "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe," to make it to the big screen. After viewing Disney's captivating $150 million adaptation, it's safe to say it was well worth the wait.

First published in 1950, "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe" is the first in a seven-volume series known as "The Chronicles of Narnia."

Produced in partnership with faith-friendly Walden Media, the movie not only stays reverently true to the story and spiritual subtext of Lewis' tale, but is a cinematic work of extraordinary beauty that, much like the title's enchanted armoire, transports viewers to a wondrous world of adventure, heroism and religious symbolism.

Set in World War II-era England, the story centers on four young siblings: Peter, the eldest of the Pevensie brood; sensible sister Susan; duplicitous Edmund; and plucky little Lucy. Evacuated from blitzkrieg-bombarded London, the children are left in the safekeeping of an elderly and eccentric professor.

While playing hide and seek, Lucy happens upon an old wardrobe through which she stumbles magically into Narnia — a fairy-tale realm populated by talking animals and mythical creatures — and she later returns along with her brothers and sister.

Their appearance foretold by an ancient Narnian prophecy, the children set out to rescue an imprisoned faun arrested for fraternizing with Lucy.

Their quest eventually leads them to fight alongside Narnia's regal lion king Aslan against the evil White Witch, Jadis, who holds the land under an icy spell of eternal deep freeze.

From the moment Lucy first sets eyes on the snow-blanketed Narnian glade, fans of the book will know that they are in sure hands with director Andrew Adamson, who never allows spectacle to overshadow the story's emotional core.

He also captures both the childlike wonder and indefinable, melancholic nostalgia for a world beyond our own that underscores all seven books.

The film uses fairy-tale and mythic motifs to explore larger themes of good and evil, sin and redemption, and death and resurrection.

This is best illustrated by the clearly allegorical Christ-figure of Aslan, "a willing victim ... killed in a traitor's stead" only to come back to life in glorified form. (Though gentle at times, Aslan is not "tame," but a wild and dangerous lion of Judah.)

Told with symbolic strokes, the deeply poignant sequence unmistakably traces Christ's passion from Gethsemane to his dying on Calvary, here a stone table upon which Aslan is ritualistically slain. Those first to witness the "resurrected" Aslan are women, and afterward Aslan "breathes" a new spirit of life into those Narnians turned to stone by the White Witch's magic, echoing both Pentecost and the harrowing of hell.

Though a few of the processed shots are obvious, overall the special effects are impressive, including a majestic — and amazingly realistic — computer-rendered Aslan.

The climactic battle may be too intense for young children, as may be scenes involving a pack of vicious wolves serving as Jadis' henchmen. Hardest of all to watch is Aslan's atoning death, surrounded by hellish legions. His apparent "defeat" is trumpeted by Jadis' victory cry, "So much for love."

Some parents may feel it inappropriately upsetting for a "family film," but Lewis himself argued that it was proper not to shield children from knowledge that they are "born into a world of death, violence, wounds, adventure, heroism and cowardice, good and evil."

Unlike Lucy at the end, you won't be left wondering if they'll ever find passage back into Narnia; with six more movies planned, the door is, thankfully, left ajar!

The film contains some battlefield violence, intense scenes of child peril and menace, and several frightening sequences. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested.

DiCerto is on the staff of the Office for Film & Broadcasting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

'Memoirs' a compelling story

Gong Li stars in a scene from the movie "Memoirs of a Geisha," a beautifully filmed and finely acted adaptation of Arthur Golden's best-seller about a girl (Ziyi Zhang) sold by her family into being a geisha in pre-World War II Japan, and her over-the-years love for a businessman (Ken Watanabe) who bought her ice cream as a child.

Director Rob Marshall has crafted what is basically an unrequited romance of the kind Hollywood used to make, though one must make cultural allowances for the concept of a geisha — strictly speaking, a woman trained to converse with and entertain men with dance and music — but there is a discreetly portrayed sexual component to the story as related here.

Some sexual banter and discreetly filmed sexual situations, including a sexual assault, and a couple of violent episodes. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

FROM THE COVER

Catholic agencies watching drug plan's effects on elderly helping Medicare beneficiaries with limited income and resources understand and utilize the prescription drug program.

Julie Trocchio, senior director for continuing care ministries at CHA, said the new benefit was "very much needed" to help Medicare beneficiaries pay for drugs prescribed to supplement the medical treatment they receive. But "whether (Medicare Part D) will do what it is intended to do remains to be seen."

The new drug benefit program was created under the Medicare Prescription Drug, Improvement and Modernization Act of 2003. Unlike Medicare itself, Part D will be administered not by a government agency but by hundreds of private plans that contract with Medicare.

In 2006, Medicare beneficiaries are projected to number more than 43 million, but fewer than 30 million were expected to enroll in Medicare drug plans by the May 15 deadline, according to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. For those who enroll by the end of 2005, coverage begins Jan. 1.

Those who delay enrolling could face hefty penalties; for some people, premiums will go up 1 percent for each month of delayed enrollment and will remain higher as long as they stay in the drug benefit program.

But it could be an equally costly mistake for people who already have certain kinds of prescription drug coverage to enroll in a Medicare Part D plan, according to the Virginia-based American Society of Consultant Pharmacists, which notes, "You could not only lose your drug benefit coverage from the other source, but all other health care benefits you may be receiving from that other source."

About one-third of Medicare beneficiaries — some 14 million people — will be eligible for government subsidies of their drug costs because their incomes are less than 150 percent of the federal poverty level.

Of those, 7 million or so will be automatically enrolled in a prescription drug plan; the other half will need to apply for the subsidy at the Social Security Administration or state Medicaid office and then enroll in a Medicare Part D plan.

But CHA officials and other members of the Access to Benefits Coalition fear that even those automatically enrolled in a prescription drug plan might lose needed coverage if the medications they use are not covered under their new plan.

Although the federal government sets certain standards for coverage, each plan offers a different set of drugs under its formula, or list of drugs for which it will pay, and a different set of provider pharmacies.

Because existing drug coverage available to low-income seniors under the joint state-federal Medicaid program is to end

Dec. 31 and the new Medicare drug benefit to begin Jan. 1, advocates for the elderly and disabled worry that gaps in coverage might not surface until it is too late.

"Even short disruptions in drug regimens can have catastrophic consequences for individuals with chronic conditions, such as HIV/AIDS, mental illness and seizure disorders," said a report by the Institute for Health & Aging at the University of California, San Francisco.

Also at risk of losing necessary drug coverage are the residents of long-term care facilities, a group that CHA described in its 2004 comments on the proposed Medicare Part D regulations as "the most frail and ill of all seniors in this country."

"A large number of long-term care residents have eight or more chronic conditions," CHA said. "To treat these conditions, most long-term care residents receive seven or more medications in a given day. The stability of their health is dependent on medication regimen."

Among the potential problems cited by CHA and other organizations were:

— Participating plans will be allowed to drop particular drugs with 60 days' notice, but beneficiaries can only change plans once a year.

— The complexity of choices and enrollment procedures for the elderly.

— The likelihood that long-term care facilities will be required to deal with a large number of different pharmacies to obtain the medicine their residents need.

But the full effects of the new program will remain unclear until well after its Jan. 1 inauguration. "We're not going to know how it works until it starts working," said Trocchio.

Abortion is a crime, says pope of Latin American bishops' committees for the family and for life, the pope urged them to share the programs and approaches that are most successful in their countries.

"Children are the major richness and the most precious good of a family," he said. "For this reason, it is necessary to help all people to be aware that the intrinsic evil of the crime of abortion, which attacks human life at its beginning, is also an aggression against society itself."

Legalized abortion has laid the groundwork for acceptance of the destruction of embryos in scientific research, he said. The result is that human life is reduced "to an object or a mere instrument. When it reaches this level, society itself suffers and its foundations shake, with all classes at risk."

The key to addressing the situation, he said, is to strengthen and defend the traditional family. The entire church must focus on efforts to "safeguard the fundamental values of marriage and the family, which are threatened by the current phenomenon of secularization."

The family must be defended from "the pressure of unjust laws" that do not recognize the rights and needs of the family and "disfigure it with false understandings of marriage and the family that do not respect the original plan of God," he said.

ARE YOU BEING CALLED TO THE HARVEST?

Then he said to His disciples, "The harvest is abundant but the laborers are few, so ask the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers for His harvest." (Mt 9:37)

I am praying that you will join me in responding to our Lord's request for more "laborers" in harvesting the abundant fruit to be found at Belmont Abbey College. Over 125 years ago the Benedictine Monks came south in response to God's call to begin His work in the vineyard of North Carolina.

He is calling you to place your hands upon the same bricks that were formed and put in place by these holy monks so long ago. I am looking for strong, dedicated, Catholic students to help realize our vision of excellence and virtue. Belmont Abbey is your Catholic College and God is calling you to the "harvest."

Searching for Christmas

IS TRUE MEANING LOST AMIDST MEDIA, COMMERCIAL INFLUENCE?

I have this recurring dream of the search for the true meaning of Christmas.

I am in a "big box" store shortly after midnight on the day after Thanksgiving. The store is packed with searchers like me. I am angry in this dream because as I reached for the last Xbox 360, an 8-year-old girl distracted me with the words, "Happy holidays," while her father swooped in to grab the electronic prize.

Next I am wrestling with a lady over the last Tickle Me Elmo doll. I have the head, she has the feet and Elmo is laughing as we stretch his seams. "Happy holidays!" I shout, but she doesn't ease her grip. And then I wake up.

It's an odd dream for me since I loathe shopping and would never be faked out by an 8-year-old. But it does make me think about the search for the true meaning of Christmas.

For the searchers, media influence is at its annual zenith with a Santa's bag of choices. Holiday programs offer music, dance and drama. News stories begin with words such as, "Just a few days before Christmas this unfortunate family ..."

We are saturated with commercial messages about the newest toy and the most expensive gadget. Enough already!

Personally I favor Easter because, even though our Lord is the reason for the Christmas season, let's face it — everyone is born, but only Jesus was resurrected.

What I like about Christmas is the surprise birthplace of the King of Kings, in a manger with only a couple of shepherds hanging around. I don't know when it happened, but sometime during the last 2,000 years all of that humility has morphed into wretched excess.

How did we get from the haunting beauty of "Silent Night" to the "Xmas Fun Songs" CD featuring, and I'm not making this up, "Grandma Got Run Over by a Reindeer"?

Everyone seems to have a list for the holidays. How about a list for the searchers? What do you suggest for someone who is looking for the true meaning of Christmas? Share yours via e-mail and I may include it in an upcoming column of The Catholic News & Herald.

There is no rush. One of the great things about our faith is that the Christmas season doesn't end when the stores close on Christmas Eve. We celebrate the nativity of our Lord until the Sunday after the Epiphany. This year that is Jan. 8.

Here is a short list for starters:

1. Combine the joy of holiday gatherings with prayers of thanks. I've noticed people in restaurants doing this more and more, and why not? Combining a prayer with a special meal or occasion brings a greater meaning to both.

2. Watch the movie, "A Christmas Carol." My favorite version of this Dickens classic was made in 1983 and starred George C. Scott as Ebenezer Scrooge. I rent a DVD so I can watch it several times during December.

My favorite line is Jacob Marley's admonition to the misguided Scrooge, who thought being a good man of business is all that mattered. "Mankind was my business!" Marley thundered. "The common welfare was my business; charity, mercy, forbearance and benevolence were all my business."

3. Give a gift anonymously.

4. Give the people you love the gift of time. This present can be unwrapped everyday. It is worth more than anything Neiman Marcus has to offer.

And remember, it's "Merry CHRISTmas, not "Happy holidays."

Should we focus just on abortion?

Specializing in one area offers distinctions, importance to overall mission

The Catholic Church is one body with many parts. The eye is not the hand, and those who focus on establishing soup kitchens are not the same as those who save babies at abortion mills.

Each individual and group has a specific vocation and has a right — indeed, a duty — to focus on it.

So why belabor the obvious?

Because for some, it's not so obvious. Many of us who focus on abortion are told that we can't give a pro-life talk unless we mention all the life issues, or can't hold a pro-life event if it's going to focus just on abortion.

Excuse me, but why not?

Obviously, there are many life issues, and we are all called to see the connection between them. But seeing that connection, we are still free to focus. To have an event or preach a homily today on abortion means we also have the freedom to have an event or preach a homily next week that focuses on world peace.

Cardinal Joseph Bernardin is often invoked for his firm articulation of the consistent ethic of life. Yet he, too, made it clear that it is perfectly legitimate to focus on a particular issue.

On one occasion he asked, "Does this mean that everyone must do everything? No! There are limits of time, energy and competency. There is a shape to every individual vocation. People must specialize; groups must focus their energies."

"The consistent ethic does not deny this. But it does say something to the Church: It calls us to a wider witness to life than we sometimes manifest in our separate activities" (address at Seattle University, March 2, 1986).

When the U.S. bishops write about the consistent ethic of life, they say the following:

"Among important issues involving the dignity of human life with which the Church is concerned, abortion necessarily plays a central role. Abortion, the direct killing of an innocent human being, is always gravely immoral (The Gospel of Life, no. 57); its victims are the most vulnerable and defenseless members of the human family. It is imperative that those who are called to serve the least among us give urgent attention and priority to this issue of justice.

"This focus and the Church's commitment to a consistent ethic of life complement one another. A consistent ethic of life, which explains the Church's teaching at the level of moral principle — far from diminishing concern for abortion and euthanasia or equating all issues touching on the dignity of human life — recognizes instead the distinctive character of each issue while giving each its proper place within a coherent moral vision" (USCCB, Pastoral Plan for Pro-life Activities, 2001).

We are all called to be concerned about every life issue, and to say so. But it is the Catholic Church as a body that is called to carry out the many works of justice, with each part of the body doing its appointed task rather than being made to feel it must do the task of everyone else.

The miracle of our Christmases

Accepting the cross helps overcome solitude

Christmas is a very special time for Christians. That we all know! But I would wager that for many of us, this miraculous event is personally momentous because of events in our lives that connect us with the child from heaven.

Last Christmas Eve was a time of pain and joy for my family. That day we buried my mother, a woman who talked always of the Lord, went to daily Mass and died peacefully at age 96.

Of course, I had tears, but I knew they were not just for Mom. Her passing brought on pangs of pain remembered, for the Christmases I have spent, as any mother who has lost a child does, wishing my three sons, Peter, John and Sterling, were at our earthly table instead of their heavenly one.

I'd found a book called "Christ in Poetry" around the time Peter, the youngest of my seven children, died. In it was a poem written by Edwin McNeill Poteat titled "Mary Pondered All These Things."

I read it, and I could relate: "Mother Mary's mind — a repository — cherished every kind of event and story. ... Mothers still, it seems, keep their hearts like Mary — full of words and dreams — like a reliquary."

I related in a different way to a poem by an early Christian mystic, Angelus

Silesius. "Though Christ a thousand times, in Bethlehem be born," he wrote, "if he's not born in thee, thy soul is still forlorn."

And he linked the birth of this child to the gift of the cross. His words seemed to be advice from heaven for me at that time: "The cross in thine own heart, alone can make thee whole."

That Christmas message — that if I accepted the cross, I never would be alone — spurred me to dry my tears that Christmas and celebrate Peter as he always had been — our jolly elf, who made us laugh. Christmas became a time for bringing back the good memories of Peter, and in years to follow, of John and Sterling too.

It just about became a tradition in the family to recall Peter — stories, with lots of laughter. Now and then there would be a subtle tear in someone's eye.

This is some of what was going on at our dinner table last Christmas. As we finished our joyful feasting, my son Paul went into the family room to play monopoly with the young children; and my son Frank went into the living room adjoining the dining room to set up a board game for later play.

As is not unusual in a family where the mother, like me, has Italian roots, we women — myself, two daughters and two daughters-in-law — still sat at the table enjoying tea and conversation, which, of course, included stories and memories of our deceased loved ones.

Rather unexpectedly we were all somewhat startled when we heard a call: "Mom!" I turned, facing the room where Frank was setting up the board game, and said: "Yeah, Frank. What do you want?"

My son looked at me and answered: "Mom, I heard that, too. It wasn't me."

In the quiet moment that followed, we each were left with our private thoughts. I knew, of course, it was Peter — his way of letting us know that he and his other two brothers were sharing Christmas joy with us.

Do miracles happen? Oh yes, and, thanks to that Mother and Child, especially at Christmastime.

World leaders, citizens must use their power to aid poor, says pope

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — World leaders, governments and citizens must use their power to come to the aid of the poor and oppressed, Pope Benedict XVI said in his weekly general audience.

God who lives on high chooses to side with the lowly and humble, turning his attention to them "with affection while he turns his gaze away from the pompous as a sign of rejection and judgment," said the pope.

"God, therefore, makes the choice to align himself in defense of the weak, the victims," a choice that is "made known to the kings" and "to all governments, to all of us that we, too, must know which side to choose ... that of the humble, the least, the poor and weak," he said in remarks apart from his text.

In his Dec. 7 general audience in St. Peter's Square, the pope dedicated his catechesis to Psalm 136, a hymn of thanksgiving for the everlasting kindness of the Lord.

The psalmist gives thanks and praises the Lord for his mercy that "endures forever." He knows that the Lord "will never abandon him" even in the face of all future trials that await him, the pope said.

God "will reach out his hand to hold and guide us," he said. He will "revive the spirits of the dejected" and "revive the hearts of the crushed," the pope said, citing the Book of Isaiah.

The faithful must be confident that no matter how burdensome "and stormy the trials will be that await us, we will never be abandoned" and left alone, the pope said.

Everyone must believe in the everlasting love and mercy of God, he said.

God is "omnipotent, and this is the final explanation for our trust" in God, that "he will use his power (to show) mercy" on his people, he said.

The pope also encouraged priests to dedicate their lives to God and saving people from sin.

At the end of the general audience, the pope greeted those taking part in a Vatican-sponsored congress commemorating the 40th anniversary of the promulgation of the Second Vatican Council Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests.

He said the document "marked a step of fundamental importance in the life of the church" with its reflections on the nature of the priestly ministry, which "links priests to Jesus Christ, head and shepherd of his people."

History of the church's tradition of infant baptisms

Q. After your recent column on infant baptism, some evangelical Protestant friends described their church's view that babies should not be baptized at all. Baptism should come only when people are old enough to profess personal belief in Jesus as their savior.

The Bible, they claim, only speaks of the baptism of adults, not of infants. When did the baptism of young children or babies begin? (Missouri)

A. The New Testament makes clear that, from the beginning, baptism was the common way to become a Christian. It is true that, according to our earliest biblical records (as in Acts 2, for example), perhaps only adults were baptized, though we can't be sure of that.

Soon afterward, however, infants were apparently included as whole families were brought into Christian communities.

All Eastern and most Western churches consider infant baptism as having been the norm from the beginning of the Christian era. The great theologian Origen, for example, about the year 280, and St. Augustine, about 400, considered infant baptism a "tradition received from the apostles."

St. Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, said at the time of his martyrdom in the year 155 or 156 that he had been "Christ's servant" for 86 years.

St. Irenaeus, one of the foremost early Christian writers and theologians (died about the year 200), was a close friend of St. Polycarp, who in turn knew St. John and the practices followed by the apostles. Christ, writes Irenaeus, gives "salvation to those of every age" who are reborn through him, and he explicitly includes "infants and little children" among them.

Certainly by the third century the common tradition was that children born to Christian parents were baptized as infants, a practice which continued until the Reformation.

In the 16th century, the Anabaptist movements, and later the Baptists and Disciples of Christ, renounced infant baptism in favor of ministering this sacrament, as you note, only after one is able to make a personal act of Christian faith.

The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church notes that the New Testament never suggests that children will need to seek baptism later. It positively hints, in fact, that infant baptism was the practice even in the time of the apostles.

Children are told they must obey their parents "in the Lord" (Col 3:20). Paul speaks of baptism as the Christian counterpart of Jewish circumcision, by which boys were admitted to the covenant community shortly after birth (Col 2).

Beyond this, evidence is lacking for infant baptism. The lack of evidence is not surprising, however, the Oxford reference says, since the New Testament is concerned mainly with the expansion of the church into the non-Christian world and hardly at all with the natural growth of membership among persons of Christian parents and upbringing.

There is, in other words, overwhelming support for the ancient Christian practice of baptizing infant children.

The psychological and spiritual bond of the family as a Christian community was recognized very early. Though children may be too young to believe on their own, the parents knew they were what St. Paul called them, a "new creation" in Jesus Christ (2 Cor 5:17).

Interestingly, the discoveries of modern psychology concerning the deep psychological and religious connections between parents and children seem to strengthen the wisdom and validity of that tradition.

Catholic spirit alive and well in Davie County parish of St. Francis of Assisi MOCKSVILLE — The community of St. Francis of Assisi Church, considered a parish in its own rights several times during its history, traces its beginnings to the 1950s. In November 1958, Holy Rosary Church in Lexington (now Our Lady of the Rosary Church) assumed pastoral responsibility for a group of about 15 Catholics in Mocksville.

Father James Keenan, then-pastor of Holy Rosary Church, celebrated Mass in homes of Mocksville parishioners until April 1959, when the former National Guard Armory became the primary place of worship.

The site of the present church in Mocksville was purchased in 1960, and the mission was placed under the patronage of St. Francis of Assisi.

Church life in Mocksville during the 1960s was a formative period. In the latter half of the decade, the chapel was renovated and enlarged, and the Ladies Guild was established. In 1968, pastoral care of the mission was given to Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury.

The mission status was underscored in 1970, when a change in pastoral responsibility returned St. Francis of Assisi Church to the care of Holy Rosary Church. Despite the frequent changes, the Mocksville faith community continued to grow. The number of families worshipping there grew from 17 in 1970 to more than 50 five years later.

In 1975, with the help of a $17,000 bequest to the church by Gertrude Dann of Norwich, Conn., the families sought permission to build a multipurpose facility to be used for liturgical celebrations, religious gatherings and social functions. The facility was constructed and then-Bishop Michael J. Begley of Charlotte dedicated the structure in October 1975.

Expansion continued the next year when the church community purchased four acres adjacent to its property. A house on the site became a rectory, and the congregation had room for future additions.

In 1980, St. Francis of Assisi Church welcomed its first resident pastor, and with him came parish status. Friars of the Atonement Father Noel McSweeney was assigned in October of that year and served until 1983, when the church again was relegated to mission status.

Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury once more took on duties in Mocksville until 1987, when the church's pastoral needs were met by Holy Family Church in Clemmons. From that point until now, sacramental obligations have been carried out by a number of pastors from Holy Family and Sacred Heart churches and, for a time, St. Francis of Assisi Church itself.

The mission label was removed once more in 1991, when Father Bernard Manley became pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Church. He remained in Mocksville until 1996, when Mercy Sister Anita Sheerin was appointed parochial administrator.

In November 1999, Franciscan Father Andrew Draper, a priest of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis, was assigned to be pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Church.

Following Father Draper's arrival, a dramatic growth began. During the first four years of his pastorate, the parish grew from 84 families to 184. The next two years saw the church's population increase to 300 families.

This growth prompted the construction of a new worship space. On Dec. 15, 2002, Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin presided over a Mass dedicating the new building.

The church now seats 300 people, replacing the older, less-accommodating building, which is now used as a parish hall.

"It was the parishioners who kept the church going," said Father Draper at the dedication. "They had a dream — they wanted a new church building."

Father Draper noted that despite the bigger parish and church, "We've kept the family atmosphere."

Pope says Vatican II reminded church to be like Mary

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Celebrating the 40th anniversary of the conclusion of the Second Vatican Council, Pope Benedict XVI said the council reminded the church to be like Mary: obedient, prayerful and courageous in times of trouble.

Marking the anniversary on the Dec. 8 feast of Mary's Immaculate Conception, Pope Benedict also said the traces of original sin are seen in the common assumption that being holy is boring and that sinning occasionally is what makes one human.

In his homily, the pope — who served as a theological expert at the council — said he remembers the moment when Pope Paul VI declared Mary "Mother of the Church."

ALL ABOUT THE FAMILY

The Wilson children, who founded the Web-based Holy Family Scapular Co. in Nashville, Tenn., are (clockwise from upper left) Joe, Nick, Jim, Mary Grace and Isabelle. The oldest sibling, Jake, is not pictured. The scapulars the Wilsons sell are a tangible reminder of family members' love and devotion to one another, especially those separated by distance or who are facing illness.

Tennessee scapular company seeks to strengthen families, aid children

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (CNS) — Like many families who visit the Holy Family Chapel, a log cabin nestled in the hills of rural middle Tennessee, the Wilsons of St. Henry Church in Nashville draw strength from the example of Mary, Joseph and Jesus.

To help "spread the message of family," Joe Wilson, a high school junior, and his five siblings recently started a Web-based business, the Holy Family Scapular Co.

Their aim is to help a wider audience rediscover the values of faith, love and sacrifice needed to preserve families.

A scapular is made up of two small pieces of cloth joined by ribbon or cord, and is worn on the chest and back beneath one's clothes as a sign of religious devotion.

The Wilsons' scapular is bigger than a traditional scapular; one side is embroidered with the image of Joseph and Mary holding the infant Jesus and the other contains an Irish prayer dedicated to the Holy Family.

The Holy Family scapulars were originally commissioned to be given to terminally ill children when they visited the Holy Family Chapel, a privately owned, nondenominational chapel that hosts hundreds of people, including more than 500 children, seeking respite from the rigors of medical treatments.

The Wilsons — Steve, Sarah and their six children, ages 6 to 19 — serve as the primary caretakers of the chapel. Through their involvement, the Wilson children have seen up close "how people's lives are messed up from sickness, and it makes you grateful to have a close family to hold onto if you can," said Nick Wilson, 14, a freshman.

Wearing the scapular reminds him that "families are really important and will always be there when everyone else shuts you out," he said.

The Holy Family scapulars have always been offered free of charge to chapel visitors, but so many people had begun requesting them for extended family and friends that continuing to give them away was becoming too costly.

So the Wilsons started the Holy Family Scapular Co. to meet increased demand, but the business is a labor of love for the children. They hoped the scapulars will help sick people and healthy families alike draw on the strength of its message.

The Wilsons are not in business to make a profit, but to "spread the news about Jesus while helping other children," as Jim Wilson puts it.

One dollar from the sale of each scapular is given to charities.

In the company's first six weeks, the Wilsons received nearly 400 orders through their Web site.

Don't let society define some as nonpersons, speaker urges conference

ROCKVILLE CENTRE, N.Y. (CNS) — The unborn, people with certain disabilities and the dying are all in danger of being defined as nonpersons, bioethicist Wesley Smith warned at the annual Respect Life Convocation in the Rockville Centre Diocese Nov. 19.

Quoting prominent bioethicists and mainstream medical journals to illustrate a trend toward dividing humanity into persons and nonpersons, Smith said the "most important question facing us in the 21st century is this: Does human life have ultimate intrinsic value simply and merely because it is human?"

In his keynote address on "Bioethics: Creating a Disposable Caste," Smith said that for those who do not uphold all human life as sacred there are two other popular redefinitions of what it means to be a person — to feel pain or to be self-aware.

If a person is a person because he or she experiences pain, this would include most humans as well as animals but exclude the unborn in the earliest stages before they have developed a central nervous system.

When a person is deemed a person because he or she is self-aware, the unborn, infants, those with certain mental disabilities, the dying and many others are easily labeled nonpersons, losing the unalienable rights protected by the government, he said.

Smith cited examples of journal articles that view humanity in this way.

"Persons who want to live are wronged by being killed because they are thereby deprived of something they value. Nonpersons or potential persons cannot be wronged in this way because death does not deprive them of anything they can value," Smith said. "If they cannot wish to live, they cannot have that wish frustrated by being killed."

"In other words," he said, "this is telling us whom we can kill and get a good night's sleep."

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope says Christmas season being spoiled by 'commercial pollution'

Christ's poverty enriches world, says pope

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said the contemporary Christmas season is being spoiled by "commercial pollution" that obscures the true meaning of Christ's humble birth.

People need to remember that Christ was born in a manger, in a sign of poverty, the pope said Dec. 11 as he greeted pilgrims from his apartment window.

Later, keeping up a tradition of Pope John Paul II, he blessed Nativity creche figurines of baby Jesus held up by thousands of Italian children in St. Peter's Square.

The custom of putting up Nativity scenes in the home is a simple and effective way of bringing back the real meaning of Christmas, the pope said.

"In modern society, this time of year unfortunately suffers a type of commercial 'pollution' that risks altering its authentic spirit, which is characterized by reflection, solemnity and a joy that is not external but personal," he said.

The Christmas creche, he said, helps people understand "the secret of the real Christmas, because it illustrates the humility and merciful goodness of Christ, who for our sake 'became poor although he was rich.'"

"His poverty enriches those who embrace it," the pope said.

He said Christmas brings true joy and peace to those who, like the shepherds at Bethlehem, recognize the sign of "an infant wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger."

"This remains the sign, even for us, men and women of the 2000s. There is no other Christmas," he said.

Continuing tradition, pope prays at Marian statue in Rome

ROME (CNS) — Continuing a tradition, Pope Benedict XVI went to the center of Rome Dec. 8 to pray at the foot of a statue of Mary.

Located near the Spanish Steps in a crowded district of upscale shops, the statue was erected to commemorate Pope Pius IX's formal declaration in 1854 of the dogma of Mary's Immaculate Conception.

Local businesses, the Rome city council and families and groups leave flowers at the base of the statue on the Dec. 8 feast of the Immaculate Conception, while Rome firefighters hang a flower wreath from Mary's arm.

Pope Benedict offered a huge basket of pink roses draped with a white and yellow ribbon — the Vatican colors.

"Carrying with me the worries and hopes of humanity today, I place them at the feet of the heavenly Mother of the Redeemer," the pope said.

The pope told the crowd that this year's feast day is especially important because it marks the 40th anniversary of the conclusion of the Second Vatican Council.

He said that in closing the council Pope Paul VI placed the trust of the church in Mary for the "fruitful application of the council's decisions."

Pope Paul's trust, he said, was well founded. Pope Benedict thanked Mary and turned to her with prayers inspired by "Lumen Gentium," the council's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church.

Addressing Mary, he prayed, "You who embraced the divine will without reservation, you who consecrated all your energies to the person and work of your son teach us to ponder in our hearts and meditate in silence on the mysteries of the life of Christ as you did."

Praying to Mary who stayed with Jesus through his suffering and death on the cross, Pope Benedict said, "Make us always feel how close you are to us at every moment of our existence, especially in times of darkness and of trial."

Finally, the pope said the faithful echo the prayer of the council in asking Mary to intercede with Jesus so that all people, "whether they are honored with the title of Christian or whether they still do not know the savior, may be happily gathered together in peace and harmony into one people of God for the glory of the most holy and undivided Trinity."

Knights of Columbus campaign to 'keep Christ in Christmas'

NEW HAVEN, Conn. (CNS) — Local councils of the Knights of Columbus kicked off the Christmas season in early December by participating in "Light Up for Christ" programs, organized to increase awareness of the true meaning of Christmas.

Councils were encouraged to hold a Christmas tree or Nativity scene lighting ceremony on the first Tuesday of December to commemorate Christ's birth.

In addition, the Knights of Columbus provides public service announcements to radio and television stations nationwide urging people to keep Christ in Christmas.

"In a modern society that is increasingly commercial and secular, it is all too easy to lose sight of the true meaning of Christmas," said Supreme Knight Carl Anderson. "It is a message that the world needs now more than ever."

Three retirees honored by bishop, pope

BY KAREN A. EVANS

CHARLOTTE — Bishop Peter J. Jugis honored Aloha Torrents, Mary Lou Hildreth and Madelyn Sullivan with the Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice Cross Dec. 7. The women were all longtime employees of the Diocese of Charlotte until their retirements in 2005.

The Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice Cross (for Church and Pope) was founded by Pope Leo XIII on July 17, 1888 and is bestowed on lay people and clergy who have given extraordinary service to the Catholic Church.

"The three individuals we honor today responded to the call of Bishop Michael J. Begley in those early years, and entered the service of the diocesan church," said Bishop Jugis. "Through their positions in the bishop's office, the chancery and the tribunal, their service also went beyond the diocesan church and put them in touch with the universal church as well."

Torrents began serving as then-Msgr. Begley's part-time secretary in 1968, when he was director of Catholic Social Services for the Diocese of Raleigh. She was chosen to be his secretary when he was appointed the residential bishop in 1971.

Torrents served continuously as secretary in the bishop's office and in the chancery from 1972, when the Diocese of Charlotte was founded, until her retirement this year.

Torrents also served as secretary to Archbishop John F. Donoghue, Chancellor and Vicar General Msgr. Mauricio West, and the diocesan administrators, Msgr. John McSweeney in 1993 and Msgr. West in 2003.

"Being a part of the 'formative' years was exciting ... just watching the rapid growth of the Catholic population and the establishment of so many diocesan offices and ministries," said Torrents. "Bishop Begley's involvement in so many areas of social justice was, for me, an education in itself. I enjoyed watching him try to make things better for the disenfranchised."

Hildreth responded to Bishop Begley's request for help in setting up the tribunal in 1972. From that time, Hildreth served continuously, directing the tribunal office and assisting each of the judicial vicars in turn — Father Justin Pechulis; Benedictine Father Bernard Rosswog; then-Father Jugis; and Father John Putnam.

Her position necessitated attendance at annual canon law conventions and workshops around the country, and regular contact with canon lawyers and their writings, to keep the diocese up to date with the most current insights in ecclesiastical jurisprudence.

"It was a lucky strike for me, because I had never worked before," Hildreth said. "I was educated — (the diocese) sent me to school two or three times a year."

diocesan operations continued to expand. She served continuously from that year, assisting each of the chancellors in turn — Msgr. Joseph Showfety, Msgr. Joseph Kerin, Msgr. McSweeney and Msgr. West.

Her position required careful attention to the voluminous record keeping for the diocese: marriage dispensations and records; property transactions; reports of diocesan statistics to national and Vatican offices; and financial transactions with parishes and other entities, to name a few.

"The chancellor had his telephone and there was another one in the adjacent office," said Sullivan. "This was the (diocesan) business office — there were no finance or development offices then. The annual Bishop's Appeal and all the financial transactions were handled by the chancellor and the bookkeeper."

"I don't think anyone ever dreamed that someday the diocesan offices would expand to what they have become today," Sullivan said.

"You have each given outstanding continuous service to the church from the earliest years of the Diocese of Charlotte," said Bishop Jugis to the recipients. "We are proud to confer this honor on you, on behalf of our Holy Father, Pope Benedict XVI."

Parishioners host party for prisoners said Ann Callahan from St. Therese Church.

The volunteers piled high with food the plates of the inmates; many inmates cycled through the line until all the food and drinks were gone.

Alexander Correctional is a 1,000-cell, close-custody (maximum security) prison facility. Since opening in 2004, the facility has invited churches to sponsor Christmas parties for the inmates.

Dan Redding, a chaplain at Alexander Correctional, made contact with Deacon Gilfillan last year. The deacon had helped him in a variety of activities, including being on the rotation for the facility's Sunday Christian services, visiting inmates and leading a Catholic Bible study.

"It seemed like a big undertaking. I knew I couldn't do it alone, so I floated the idea out to a few people on our community life commission and was surprised with the response," said Deacon Gilfillan. "I saw a great desire to bring Christ into one of the darker places in our world."

The parish's Prime Timer group baked homemade cakes, said Deacon Gilfillan.

Deacon Gilfillan approached Callahan about visiting the inmates.

"We had been struggling to get our prison ministry up and running," she said. "This gave us an opportunity to actually get inside a prison and talk to inmates."

Micki Earp of Holy Trinity Church

'Out of all the groups that came last year, the inmates enjoyed the Catholic party the most.'

had toured the prison before it opened. As a leader of her parish's community life commission, she saw a great opportunity to get involved in ministry at the nearby prison.

"We are the closest church (to the facility). This Christmas party gave our commission a chance to look at starting some type of prison ministry here," said Earp.

Both the inmates and volunteers benefited from the experience.

"Out of all the programs that we offered last year, this was the one that was best received by the inmates," said Redding. "Out of all the groups that came last year, the inmates enjoyed the Catholic party the most."

After the feast, Kris Mulligan, faith formation and music director at St. Joseph Church, led the assembly in Christmas songs. Afterward, many of the inmates went back through the serving line — this time to thank volunteers.

Speaking to Deacon Gilfillan, one inmate said, "You have been a blessing to us. Your just being here will be one of our greatest Christmas gifts."

Hispanic youths discuss needs at encounter

Event to guide talks at regional, national meetings

BY MANUEL ALIAGA

SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

MOORESVILLE — More than 250 people participated recently in the first diocesan Encounter for Hispanic Youth and Young Adult Ministry.

The event, sponsored by the diocesan offices of youth ministry, young adult ministry, Hispanic ministry and Hispanic youth and young adult ministry, was held at St. Therese Church in Mooresville Dec. 3. Themed "Weaving the Future Together," the encounter's logo was the fisherman's net, a reminder of Jesus' invitation to be fishers of men.

The encounter was the culmination of months of effort to identify the needs and contributions of Hispanics in the diocese's parishes. The process will continue at the first regional encounter in Atlanta, Ga., in March 2006 and the first national encounter at University of Notre Dame in South Bend, Ind., in June 2006.

The central goal of the nationwide initiative is to help both Hispanic youths and the leadership working in Hispanic youth and young adult ministries to empower Hispanic youths into a more active, enthusiastic and influential participation in the life and mission of the Catholic Church.

A large percentage of the Hispanic population is composed of youths or young adults but only a small number of them are involved in organized church groups, said Alejandro Aguilera-Titus, associate director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Hispanic Affairs.

"The main reason is that it was assumed that Hispanic youths would just assimilate into existing English-language groups," he said.

But this has not happened, he added.

Aguilera-Titus said that "Hispanic youths fell between the cracks of a Hispanic ministry that is basically for adults and a church youth ministry that is basically for descendants of Europeans."

The bishops are aware of the situation and hope that the 2006 meeting will help the church tap into this large potential for active church members, said Aguilera-Titus.

Plans call for 2,000 delegates to attend. The delegates will be Hispanics under 30 years of age chosen from dioceses throughout the United States, including the Diocese of Charlotte.

Aguilera-Titus cited the bishops' 2002 statement, "Encuentro and Mission," as the call to action for the national conference, co-sponsored by the university and the Hispanic affairs secretariat. An additional 15 Catholic groups involved in Hispanic and/or youth ministry are helping organize the conference.

"The traditional model of parish youth ministry does not, for the most part, reach Hispanic young people because of economic, linguistic, cultural, age and educational differences," said the bishops in 2002. "Generally speaking, the majority of parish youth ministry programs serve a population that is mostly European white, mainstream, middle-class and English-speaking."

A principal aim of the 2006 meeting is to find out what parish models are working in attracting Hispanic youths, said Rey Malave, president of the National Catholic Network de Pastoral Juvenil Hispana (of Hispanic Youth Ministry) and chairman of the conference. The fact that the network's title is half in English and half in Spanish is deliberate.

The conference wants to get an idea of what the realities are for Hispanic youths, why they are not participating in church groups and what they want from the church, he said.

A major challenge cited by experts in Hispanic youth ministry is the diversity among Hispanic youths.

Background materials prepared for the conference note that the population includes both immigrants as well as U.S.-born Hispanics whose families have lived in the United States for several generations.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, several preparatory sessions took place between June and November 2005 to consult with and analyze the needs of Hispanic youths. Hispanic youth groups from throughout the diocese who work at the parish level met again during the first diocesan encounter.

During the meeting, they worked with participants from other parishes to further refine the diagnosis prepared thus far.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis participated in some of the group discussions during the encounter.

The daylong event ended with Mass celebrated by the bishop. Afterward, the bishop blessed the 23 delegates elected to take part in the regional encounter in March.

Manuel Aliaga is a volunteer with the diocesan Hispanic ministry office.

Catholic News Service contributed to this story.

CHARACTERISTICS OF HISPANIC YOUTHS

The U.S. Census Bureau estimates that, in 2003, 56 percent of the nation's Hispanic population of 40 million was under 30 years of age.

The population includes immigrants and U.S.-born Hispanics whose families have lived in the United States for several generations.

Other characteristics cited include:

— Linguagewise, some are monolingual in Spanish, some speak only English and some are bilingual.

— Economically, most are either working class or middle class.

— Racially, they are white, black or mixed race.

— Most go to public schools.

— A significant number have low educational attainment, with fewer than 20 percent going to college.

Local Hispanic leader honored

CHARLOTTE — Hilda Gurdian, a parishioner of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte, was honored recently for her community efforts.

Gurdian, publisher and chief executive officer of the Charlotte-based La Noticia newspaper, was among the Hispanic leaders from the Charlotte area recognized at the National League of Cities' Congress of Cities in Charlotte Dec. 9-10.

The group was honored for its efforts in helping advance Hispanic communities in the Charlotte region.

During the two-day congress, participants explored the effects of immigration on local government, explored ways local officials could support immigration populations and discussed ways to communicate with non-English-speaking communities.

Mexican food and a mariachi band.

The feast day recalls the appearance of Mary to an Aztec peasant, Juan Diego, on Tepeyac Hill near Mexico City on Dec. 9, 1531. Through several appearances Dec. 9-12 and a series of miracles, Mary converted 9 million Aztecs to Catholicism.

Hispanic people throughout the United States and Latin America continue to celebrate the event each Dec. 12. In Mexico, people make pilgrimages to the Basilica of Guadalupe in Mexico City on that day.

"Being raised in a strong Polish Catholic tradition, I learned that it was always 'to Jesus through Mary' and we celebrated many Marian feasts," said parishioner Joan Zdanski.

Mary, said Zdanski, is the vessel who carried Jesus, who is our way to salvation.

"Therefore, Our Lady of Guadalupe has a special significance because she is the patroness of all the Americas," she said. "Mary has always manifested herself to the humble. The telling of the story of St. Juan Diego emphasizes the simplicity of this peasant."

Father Luis Osorio, pastor of Holy Infant Church, said his first exposure to Our Lady of Guadalupe did not occur until he came to the United States from Colombia 15 years ago.

"The Mexican community has had a very strong devotion to our Holy Mother for centuries," said Father Osorio. "Every year, on the anniversary of the appearance of Mary to St. Juan Diego and the miracle of the image of Guadalupe, they spend much time praying and bringing roses."

"We who are Hispanic, especially Mexican, identify ourselves very much with Mary of Guadalupe," said Eneidino Aquino, coordinator of Hispanic ministry in the Greensboro Vicariate.

"For our suffering people, who are oppressed by the powerful and who find ourselves separated from our fatherland, we feel like outsiders and Mary represents everything we love," said Aquino. "Thus, we feel more at home when we celebrate our traditions and venerate her in union with our living God."

"I grew up in a little town in Michoacán, Mexico, where we have a very strong tradition and culture surrounding the celebration on Dec. 12," said parishioner Manuel Rodriguez.

"Even as she changed the lives of the natives with her appearances, she has also changed my life," he said. "The Virgin Mary is the one who said 'yes' and now shows us the way to follow Jesus."

Parishioner Mike Hooker noted the feast day occurs during Advent.

"It is the perfect time of the year because Our Lady of Guadalupe brings us so much hope and joy," he said.

The history of Our Lady of Guadalupe

It was Mary's appearances to Juan Diego (canonized July 31, 2002) and the resulting miracles that Hispanic people throughout the United States and Latin America celebrate on Dec. 12.

Passing Tepeyac Hill near Mexico City on his way to Mass on Dec. 9, 1531, Juan Diego, a peasant and convert to Christianity, heard a beautiful woman dressed as an Aztec princess call his name.

Diego climbed the hill to the woman, who told him to tell the bishop in Mexico City that she wanted a temple built on the hill. It took three trips and a miracle to convince the bishop.

After his second visit to the bishop, Diego found Castilian roses and other flowers growing on frozen Tepeyac Hill. He gathered the flowers in his tilma (cape) and carried them to the bishop. Diego related the events of the day on Tepeyac and then opened his tilma to allow the flowers, mingled with the Castilian roses for which the bishop had secretly prayed, to fall to the floor. At the moment they looked up, the image of Our Lady appeared on the tilma.

When Diego returned home, he found that his uncle, who had been ill, was well, as Mary had promised. The uncle said that Mary had told him that she wanted to be called the "Ever Virgin, Holy Mary of Guadalupe."

This further astounded the bishop. Guadalupe had no meaning in Mexico. It was the name of a famous Marian shrine in Spain.

Bishop Zumarraga, a Franciscan friar, would have known the shrine well, since a Franciscan monastery had been built there to enshrine a statue of Mary holding the child Jesus.

Word of the miraculous cape spread, and 9 million Aztecs converted to Catholicism.

The tilma is preserved in the Basilica of Guadalupe in Mexico City. Normally, cactus-fiber capes last about 20 years, but this tilma is intact 473 years after the image appeared upon it.

Our Lady of Guadalupe was named "Patroness of the Americas" in 1946.

Traditional dance, song honor Our Lady

Above: Children perform traditional dances at St. Margaret of Scotland Church in Maggie Valley during the celebration for the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe Dec. 12. About 100 people from the parish and throughout Haywood County attended the Mass and festival.

Below: Augustinian Father Robert Dueweke, Hispanic minister at St. Margaret of Scotland Church, gathers children in the church as everyone sings "las mañanitas" on the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe, Dec. 12. The songs are traditionally sung early in the morning to awaken the Virgin Mary. This was the first Our Lady of Guadalupe festival at the church.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice addresses the media during a NATO foreign ministers' meeting at NATO headquarters in Brussels, Belgium, Dec. 8. European allies of the United States said they were satisfied with new assurances by Rice that U.S. treatment of detainees adhered to international law.

Many back anti-torture amendment

As the House prepared to take up an amendment to the Defense Department appropriations bill banning "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" of prisoners and spelling out what that means, supporters of the McCain amendment on torture and abuse rallied backers from diverse backgrounds.

Steve Colecchi, director of the Office of International Justice and Peace of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said the bishops support the amendment because the church teaches respect for fundamental human rights and dignity.

"The many reports of prisoner abuse by members of the U.S. armed forces tarnish the reputation of our country," Colecchi said at a Dec. 7 media briefing sponsored by Human Rights First.

But, he said, they also "make it less likely that other countries and people will collaborate with us in the struggle against terrorism, and they compromise the moral standing of our nation as we seek to win the hearts and minds of others."

He said respect for the dignity of every individual, whether ally or enemy, must be the foundation of the pursuit of security, justice and peace.

"There can be no compromise on the moral imperative to protect the basic human rights of any individual incarcerated for any reason," Colecchi said. "In a time of terrorism and great fear, our obligation to respect basic human dignity and human rights, even of our worst enemies, gains added importance."

Cruel and unusual

The briefing came on the same day Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said at a news conference in Kiev, Ukraine, that existing prohibitions on cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment extend to all U.S. personnel in the United States and elsewhere.

The Bush administration has been criticized around the world recently for how prisoners are treated in the name of combating terrorism. Last year's reports of abuse of prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq have been followed more recently by news stories about secret prisons operated by the United States in Eastern Europe and others alleging mistreatment of prisoners who were being transferred aboard clandestine flights.

The amendment introduced by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., would make the Army Field Manual on interrogation the standard for questioning anyone in military custody. The manual prohibits techniques such as mock executions, electric shock, abnormal sleep deprivations and any form of beating.

The amendment passed the Senate by a 90-9 vote. The House-passed version of the Defense appropriations bill did not include the McCain amendment.

A House vote on the provision was expected before Congress recesses for Christmas.

Defining the rules

At the Dec. 7 briefing, Rabbi Brian Walt, director of Rabbis for Human Rights, said Jews are particularly sensitive to the issue of state-sponsored torture because of their history of being victims of torture. One of the readings used annually during the high holy days recounts the fate of 10 rabbis who were tortured under Roman authorities, he explained.

Rabbi Walt said only an absolute ban on such treatment is acceptable. A letter from more than 500 rabbis to President George W. Bush and members of Congress notes that Jewish tradition calls for humane treatment even of one's adversaries and that rabbinic texts strongly prohibit acts of humiliation.

Retired Brig. Gen. David R. Irvine, who taught interrogation and military law for 18 years at the Sixth Army Intelligence School, said the McCain amendment is necessary because, while the Army field manual is clear in what it means by prohibited torture and abuse, "individuals in high positions have very deliberately changed the definition of torture."

Under a recent Defense Department memorandum to define how much pain interrogators can inflict, a questioner could go so far as to break a subject's fingers one by one without violating the directive, Irvine said.

"This fuzzifying of definitions can only be overcome by a strong statement from Congress that a bright line is there" to define how prisoners must be treated, he said.

William Howard Taft IV, former legal adviser to former Secretary of State Colin Powell and a former deputy Defense secretary, said military personnel themselves have been unclear what the rules are because they regularly receive different advice.

No exceptions

Stephen Rickard, director of the Washington office of the Open Society Policy Center and a longtime human rights activist, said Rice's comments in Kiev "have to be parsed incredibly carefully to see if there's even a change" from current U.S. policies he said are ambiguous.

In light of ambiguous directives from the Defense Department, he said, and the news about Abu Ghraib and secret prisons, Rickard said, "this administration doesn't have any credibility" when it argues that Congressional action is not necessary.

Colecchi said he heard that as House, Senate and White House negotiators try to come up with a version of the amendment all are willing to support, the possibility has been raised of including exceptions for when torture might be permitted.

"Any exception says people are expendable, that some people's human rights don't count," he said. "There is no exception to a fundamental moral principle."

Views on Torture

70% of U.S. adults believe American troops or government officials have tortured prisoners in Iraq or other countries.

38% would be willing to have torture used against suspected terrorists if they may know details about future terrorist attacks against the U.S.

Army Prohibited Techniques

The Army Field Manual on intelligence interrogation states that U.S. policy "prohibits acts of violence or intimidation," including, but not limited to...

- electric shock
- infliction of pain through chemicals or bondage
- forcing an individual to stand, sit or kneel in abnormal positions for prolonged periods
- food deprivation
- any form of beating
- mock executions
- abnormal sleep deprivation
- chemically induced psychosis
- coercion

Vatican II reminded church to be like Mary, says pope and stood applauding, paying homage to the Mother of God, our mother, the mother of the church," he said.

In its teaching about the role of the church and its members in the world, the council pointed believers "to 'the great believer' who, full of faith, placed herself in God's hands, abandoning herself to his will," the pope said.

The council pointed them to "the humble mother who was part of her son's mission when that was required and, at the same time, to the courageous woman who, when the disciples ran away, stood under the cross," he said.

Reciting the Angelus after the Mass, the pope said, "in a special way, we pray today for all mothers. Through Mary's intercession may they foster love and holiness in their families."

In his Angelus address, he called the Second Vatican Council "the greatest church event of the 20th century."

The pope said he wanted to have a solemn celebration "to give thanks to God for the gift of the Second Vatican Council. I also want to give thanks to most holy Mary for having accompanied these 40 years of church life rich in events."

Mary, he said, watched over the pontificates of his predecessors, each of whom guided the church with pastoral wisdom in the renewal called for by the council.

The major part of Pope Benedict's homily during the morning Mass focused on original sin and what it means to say that Mary was kept free from all sin from the moment of her conception.

The Genesis story of Adam and Eve being tempted to disobey God and to eat the forbidden fruit so they would have knowledge and be like gods "describes not only the story of the beginning, but the story of all times," the pope said.

"All of us bear in ourselves a drop of the poison of that way of thinking," he said.

"We call this drop of poison 'original sin.'"

While Catholics honor Mary, who was free from sin, Pope Benedict said, "we have a suspicion that those who do not sin at all are basically boring."

Unless they sin, he said, they seem to be missing something important, "the dramatic dimension of being autonomous."

Like Adam and Eve, the pope said, people suspect that God wants to limit their freedom, that "God's love creates dependency and that it is necessary to rid oneself of this dependency in order to be fully oneself."

However, the life of Mary demonstrates that "love is not dependency, but the gift that allows us to live" and that freedom can grow only when "we live in a just way with one another and for one another."

"If we live against love and against truth — against God — then we will destroy ourselves and our world," Pope Benedict said.

People think "that part of being truly human is the freedom to say no, to descend down into the darkness of sin and to want to do things by oneself; that only then can one fully experience the vastness and depth of being human, of being truly ourselves; that we must put our freedom to the test even against God," he said.

"In a word, we think that evil basically is good, that we all need at least a little of it in order to experience the fullness of being," the pope said.

However, Pope Benedict said, "looking at the world around us, we can see that it is not that way, that evil always poisons; that it does not raise man up, but lowers and humiliates him; that it does not make him greater, purer and richer, but damages and diminishes him."

The feast of the Immaculate Conception is a call to all believers to realize that the person who "totally abandons himself in God's hands does not become God's puppet, a boring, spineless person," he said.

"Only the one who trusts totally in God will find true freedom, the great and creative vastness of the freedom of goodness," he said.

"You will see that with him your life will become vast and enlightened — not boring, but full of infinite surprises because the goodness of God can never be exhausted," the pope said.

Magazine for Catholic girls aims for truer image of young femininity

BY STEVE EUVINO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

MICHIGAN CITY, Ind. — Brandi Lee and Stephanie Murphy had some time on their hands and an idea: creating a magazine for girls that features fashions that won't break their teen budgets and won't reveal most of their young bodies.

Their idea will take fruition when True Girl magazine hits mailboxes in early 2006.

True Girl is a faith-based publication. Readers won't find photos or advertising about the most revealing fashions, or see photos of the "coolest boys" from around the country.

According to Lee and Murphy, who are both Catholic and live in the Gary Diocese, readers will find stories and photos for and about girls — ages 12-18 is the target market — that reflect a realistic view of young femininity, based on church teachings, not sexy trends or horoscopes.

"You are in charge of your own destinies," Lee told middle-school girls at St. Stanislaus Kostka School in Michigan City during an afternoon visit to promote the magazine Dec. 2.

True Girl will be mailed in late January 2006 for its debut February-March issue. The bimonthly periodical will not be heavy on advertising.

True Girl will offer advice on affordable, appropriate clothing and jewelry, often sold by Catholic women who, Murphy said, "provide an example ... working hard, making it happen."

"We want to focus on educating and inspiring," Lee said, adding the magazine is "not about gossip, but about real girls."

The first issue will include a story about a girl now residing in Indiana who was displaced by Hurricane Katrina and who, despite losses from the storm, has grown in her faith.

As to beauty and dating tips, Lee and Murphy said the magazine will focus on "taking advantage of all God's given us and how we can be examples to others."

Any comments on dealing with the opposite sex, the women said, will come from a Catholic perspective.

Lee is officially the editor, while Murphy's title is publisher. However, the two women wear many hats and are learning to wear even more.

Regular features will include "Ask Aunt Sarah," a column from a Catholic grandmother; features on women living their vocations — married, single, or religious; a rosary reflection; appropriate fashions; alternating film, book, or music reviews; and features on real girls living their faith.

A press release said the magazine is being funded by Murphy, a mother of five. In addition to subscriptions, she and Lee plan to distribute the magazine to Catholic schools, youth groups and youth conventions across the country.

Therese Hullinger, an eighth-grader at St. Stanislaus Kostka, is the "cover girl" for the premiere issue of True Girl. Involved at school and in her community, the 14-year-old was looking forward to the magazine — and not just seeing her picture on the cover.

"This is really a great thing for girls," Hullinger said. "It's hard for us to be perfect like other magazines say we can be."

Editor's note: More information on the magazine is available online at: www.truegirlonline.com.

Christmas is time to know God, Jesus

BY DAN LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The express lane shopper silently counted his purchases, making sure he was below the limit, when he heard someone call his name. It was an acquaintance from church, and cradled in his arms was a framed portrait of the late Elvis Presley.

As always when talking about the famous singer, the first man told his "brush with fame" story about having been to a high school dance at which the then unknown Presley performed. The effect on his listener was electric.

As a devoted fan he had read many books, scholarly and popular, about Elvis. He had watched all of his movies. He had listened lovingly to all of Presley's countless recordings, from the early rock-a-billy songs with twangy guitars to the modern standards with full orchestral backing.

"I know a lot about him," he lamented, "but I never saw him in person."

We can learn something — even something important — about people from a distance. We can read biographies telling their life story. We can discover in their letters, poems, memos or grocery lists some telling truths about their deepest values and dearest longings, about their inner lives.

But that's never the same as personal contact.

The difference between knowing about someone and knowing someone personally is what the feast of the Incarnation — Christmas — celebrates.

The second reading for the Mass of Christmas Day, from Hebrews, reminds us that God entered fully into the human family by becoming one of us. We no longer know God partially and indirectly, through the testimony of the prophets.

In Jesus, God speaks his word in person. He invites us to know him, not as fans of a celebrity or as scholars of some obscure ancient figure, but as someone real and present in the believing community of the church and in the deepest chambers of our own hearts.

Questions:

What is one specific way I can enter into deeper conversation with Jesus during this Christmas season? Who among my circle of family and friends might profit from hearing about my personal experience of Jesus?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"And the Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us, and we saw his glory" (John 1:14).

'Family' worth visiting during Christmas holidays

BY HARRY FORBES
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK (CNS) — The credits suggest an up-to-date riff on the picture-postcard opening of "Meet Me in St. Louis," and the initial shot of the family's New England house has something of the old-fashioned solidity of the Smith homestead in the MGM musical.

But even though the earlier film — and Judy Garland's rendering of "Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas" — provide a poignant counterpoint here, "The Family Stone" (20th Century Fox) is dealing with more complex issues than the family Smith's upheaval from Missouri to New York.

This bittersweet Christmas comedy-drama concerns New York businessman Everett Stone (Dermot Mulroney), who brings his professionally assured but socially awkward fiancée, Meredith (Sarah Jessica Parker), home to New England to meet the folks.

They include mother Sybil (Diane Keaton) and father Kelly (Craig T. Nelson), sisters Amy (Rachel McAdams) and Susannah (Elizabeth Reaser), brothers Ben (played by a warmly sympathetic Luke Wilson) and Thad (Ty Giordano), who — in one of several contrivances — just happens to be deaf. And gay. And living with an African-American partner (Brian White). (In fairness, the very likable Giordano is a deaf actor.)

Sensing (not without cause) that everyone — especially Amy — dislikes her, Meredith invites her sister, Julie (Claire Danes), to join her for moral support, leading to romantic complications. There's an immediate and genuine chemistry between Julie and Everett that is missing from the latter's spiky relationship with the controlling yet insecure Meredith.

Ben, for his part, takes an immediate shine to Meredith, and sees in her something endearing beyond the foot-in-mouth persona. Along the way, we learn that Sybil has had a bout with some illness, presumably cancer, and that it's come back again, though the family doesn't know.

Angry Amy will soften when the boyfriend (Paul Schneider) with whom she was once involved comes back into her life, and Meredith will come to terms with her own anxieties, and win acceptance by the family.

Though most of what happens is predictable, the payoff is satisfying.

Writer-director Thomas Bezucha's low-keyed film takes its sweet time getting started, and the easy pace doesn't at first yield much in the way of dramatic dividends, but about midway through the story grabs you, and tugs at the heart, building to a moving life- and family-affirming fade-out.

The performances are all excellent. Parker is a high-powered Manhattan career gal, but a far cry from the self-assured Carrie Bradshaw on "Sex and the City." Keaton radiates genuine maternal qualities and, given Sybil's underlying condition, a resigned sadness.

Flaws and all, this is a worthy and ultimately touching addition to that ever-popular genre, the Christmas movie.

This film contains some profanity and crude language, light sexual banter, partial nudity, a same-sex couple and their adopting a child, premarital situations, and drug references.

The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Naomi Watts and Adrien Brody star in "King Kong," a visually staggering remake of the 1933 classic about a giant ape smitten by a blonde-haired beauty (Watts), captured from his lost world island home by a maverick filmmaker (Jack Black) and taken in captivity to New York, where his rampage climaxes atop the Empire State Building.

Director Peter Jackson's storytelling masterfully blends stunning action sequences, humor and pathos-tinged emotion, paying reverent homage to the original while fleshing out the tragic story and raising the movie-magic bar to dazzling new heights.

The film includes a jaw-dropping centerpiece where Kong faces off against three tyrannosauruses (Jackson upped the ante from the original's one-on-one death match).

Few images in American cinema are more iconic than Kong battling biplanes high above the New York skyline, here dazzlingly executed with heightened drama. What gives the scene its heartbreaking poignancy are the tender moments between Kong and Darrow that bookend the aerial assault.

The film has an old-time Hollywood feel with no sex or profanity, though elements push the envelope of its PG-13 rating.

Intense action violence, some frightening and disturbing images, fleeting burlesque images and a few instances of profanity make it inappropriate for younger adolescents.

The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Teacher included in Who's Who publication

CHARLOTTE — Lisa Horton, technology instructor at St. Ann School in Charlotte, was nominated and accepted as one of the 2005 Who's Who Among America's Teachers.

Horton has been teaching at St. Ann School for 11 years and during that time has been awarded a Grant for Education Excellence from the Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools education foundation and Lead Teacher Award from WeatherBug Achieve.

Horton was nominated for the ninth edition of Who's Who Among America's Teachers by a former student as a teacher who has shaped and inspired the student's current achievements.

Students are requested to nominate one teacher from their academic experience who made a difference in their lives by helping shape their values, inspire interest in a particular subject and challenge them to strive for excellence.

All of the 114,000 teachers honored in the publication were nominated by former students who themselves are currently listed in Who's Who Among American High School Students, Who's Who Among American High School Students — Sports Edition or The National Dean's List.

"There is no greater honor teachers can receive than to be recognized by former students for their excellence and dedication," said Parke Davis, national academic affairs chairman for Educational Communications Inc., which publishes the Who's Who publications and The National Dean's List.

"In this publication, we clearly have the best teachers in America selected by the best students," said Davis.

Don Mulligan, chair of the Respect Life Committee at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point, presents essay contest awards to (from left) George Schlaepi, Jennifer Lindh and Donna Elliott at Immaculate Heart of Mary School Dec. 16.

The essays written by the three eighth-graders won the committee's annual contest. George won first place for his essay on respecting the earth, in particular protecting rainforests. Jennifer placed second for her essay on respecting parents. Donna won third place for her work on respecting those with Down Syndrome.

The awards included certificates and prizes.

Athletes, alumni honored at Bishop McGuinness

KERNERSVILLE — Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School celebrated Homecoming with its third annual Athletic Hall of Fame and second annual Distinguished Alumni Hall of Fame induction ceremonies Oct. 29.

"The legacies of all these exceptional individuals are a gift of extraordinary value to the life and the living memory of this school," said Principal George Repass.

The Athletic Hall of Fame welcomed a group of outstanding athletes, including Ime Archibong (class of 1999), currently a performance analyst and software engineer; Janet Daugherty (class of 1988), a former teacher and coach at a South Carolina high school; and Dan Spainhour, coach and athletic director at Bishop McGuinness in the 1990s.

The Distinguished Alumni Hall of Fame honored Mercy Sister Larretta Rivera-Williams (class of 1972), director of religious education and pastoral associate at St. Benedict the Moor Church in Winston-Salem; and Dan Morrison (class of 1985), former speechwriter for former Secretary of State Collin Powell.

"We celebrate the achievements of these inspiring alumni since graduating from Bishop McGuinness," said Felipe Villalon, chairman of the alumni relations committee.

"They live the school motto of 'Excel That You Might Better Serve' with their dedication to excellence, achievement and service," he said.

ARE YOU BEING CALLED TO THE HARVEST?

Then he said to His disciples, "The harvest is abundant but the laborers are few; so ask the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers for His harvest." (Mt 9:37)

I am praying that you will join me in responding to our Lord's request for more "laborers" in harvesting the abundant fruit to be found at Belmont Abbey College. Over 125 years ago the Benedictine Monks came south in response to God's call to begin His work in the vineyard of North Carolina.

He is calling you to place your hands upon the same bricks that were formed and put in place by these holy monks so long ago. I am looking for strong, dedicated, Catholic students to help realize our vision of excellence and virtue. Belmont Abbey is your Catholic College and God is calling you to the "harvest."

No room in the inn

TODAY CHRIST SEEKS ROOM
IN OUR HEARTS, LIVES

"She wrapped him in swaddling cloths and laid him in a manger, because there was no room for them in the inn" (Luke 2:7).

The fact that there was no room for Jesus, Mary and Joseph in the inn at Bethlehem on the first Christmas should make us wonder, because the birth of Christ was foreseen and planned by God from all eternity.

Hundreds of years before it happened, the prophets announced he would be born of a virgin (Is. 7:14) and that Bethlehem would be his birthplace (Micah 5:2). Many other details of his life and death were also foretold.

Did God, then, forget to make room for his only Son? How is it possible that there was no room, when the child born at Christmas owns the inn, Bethlehem and the world, and every inch of room in the whole universe?

Obviously, God did this on purpose. There was no room in the inn because this demonstrates that the world has rejected God. The world makes no room for the God who created it. There was no room in the inn because God wanted to show that his son comes as a Savior, to reconcile a world that is at enmity with God.

Being turned away from the inn foreshadows the fact that the Savior himself will be rejected, despised and ultimately crucified, and that all this was part of God's plan.

Ultimately, the lack of room in the inn symbolizes the lack of room we make for him in our hearts. When our hearts are filled with all kinds of desires other than God, we gradually crowd him out altogether.

No room at the inn also means that we fail to make room for our brothers and sisters. The first great commandment is to love God and the second is like it: Love your neighbor.

Christ willed to be left out, because he is always in solidarity with those who are left out, shut out and crowded out.

That is the position of the unborn children today. They are crowded out of the busy schedules of so many people doing so many good and important things, but who don't have a finger to lift to protect the lives of these children from abortion.

They are crowded out of legislative agendas, preaching schedules, career plans and volunteer activities. There's just too much going on already; there's no room in the inn.

Christ comes at Christmas to change all that. Today, he does not seek a room in inn; he seeks room in our own hearts and lives. And he asks that as we welcome him, we welcome everyone whom he welcomes, including the children most defenseless and forgotten.

We welcome the Divine Child, and in doing so, we welcome every child. As we celebrate Christmas, we sing in "O Holy Night" the words, "Chains shall he break, for the slave is our brother, and in his name all oppression shall cease."

Amen! Let oppression cease and let Christmas come for the unborn.

God never leaves people, even at moment of death, says pope

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — God never leaves his creatures alone, not even at the moment of death when each person must complete his or her journey without the company of anyone else, Pope Benedict XVI said.

God continually stretches out his hand to guide those he loves, the pope said Dec. 14 during his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square.

"His closeness is not one of judgment that incites terror, but one of support and liberation," the pope said.

Offering a reflection on Psalm 139 and its praise of God who is "all knowing and ever present," Pope Benedict set aside his prepared text to focus on the extent to which God remains with each individual not only in life, but also at the moment of death.

"God is always with us. Even in the darkest nights of our lives, he does not abandon us. Even at the most difficult times of our lives, he is present," Pope Benedict said.

"And even on the last night, in the last solitude where no one can accompany us, the night of death, the Lord does not abandon us," he said.

"Therefore, we Christians can trust that we are never left alone. The goodness of God never abandons us," the pope said.

In his prepared text, Pope Benedict said that although God looks on evil with severity, "his is not a looming and inspeccatorial presence," but a "saving presence capable of embracing all existence and all history."

At the end of the audience, the pope spent more than an hour shaking hands, blessing children and collecting gifts.

The smaller gifts were wrapped for Christmas, but the pope also was given a large crystal cross, a jewel-encrusted Book of the Gospels from the faithful of the Italo-Albanian Catholic Church, table linens, a wooden Nativity scene and several paintings, especially of Mary.

The Pope Speaks

POPE

The gifts — including a huge tome on Gothic architecture, music CDs and books about the election of Pope Benedict — continued to arrive as the pope met briefly with publishers attending a meeting with the Vatican's publishing house.

Jesuit Father Joseph Fessio, founder and editor in chief of Ignatius Press, which has published the former Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger's books in English, gave the pope a Lectionary.

Father Fessio told Catholic News Service that the book was the first copy of the volume of Mass readings that Ignatius Press will be selling. It has been approved by the Antilles Episcopal Conference for liturgical use in the Caribbean nations belonging to the conference.

The Jesuit said that after the Vatican told the U.S. bishops that a Lectionary based on the inclusive-language New Revised Standard Version of the Bible would not be approved, Ignatius Press secured a 50-year license for a Lectionary based on a second Catholic edition of the original Revised Standard Version.

Father Fessio said Pope Benedict asked Dec. 14 if the Lectionary would be used anywhere besides the Antilles and Father Fessio told him he is hoping the Ignatius Press Lectionary would be adopted by other bishops' conferences.

The sign of peace, pre-Vatican II

Q. I am a Vatican II baby, born after the council closed, and have a question about the older rite. Was there a sign of peace then? As far as I can tell there wasn't. I'm sure it's ancient, but why did it start?

More specifically, why is it placed near Communion? If Jesus said we should be reconciled with our brother before we bring our gifts to the altar (Mt 5:23-24), shouldn't the sign of peace be at the beginning of Mass? (Pennsylvania)

A. You have some good insights and questions.

The kiss, or sign, of peace is indeed among the oldest rites connected with the Mass. At least five times the New Testament speaks of Christians greeting each other with a "holy kiss," or "kiss of love" (for example Rom 16:16, 1 Pt 5:14).

It seems certain that at least by around the year 150, a kiss was already a regular part of the liturgy as an expression of unity and peace among Christians.

For centuries the "pax" (peace), as it was called, was exchanged by everyone at Mass. Toward the late Middle Ages, only the attending clergy observed the practice, usually substituting another sign such as an embrace for an actual kiss.

This continued until our present time when a sign of peace is again prescribed in some manner for all the faithful. The church's instructions for Mass indicate that each person before the breaking of the bread offers a sign of peace to those nearby.

In this manner the church asks for peace and unity for herself and for the whole human family, and the faithful offer a sign of their communion with the church and their love for each other before receiving Communion together (General Instruction of the Roman Missal 82).

In the beginning this rite did take place early in the celebration of the Eucharist, apparently for the reasons you give. It later found its way to the time around Communion, which we still designate the "sign of unity and the bond of love."

Some discussion has taken place during the past few decades about moving the sign of peace back again to an earlier part of Mass. As of now, however, it remains before Communion, which, as I said, still gives it a particularly appropriate significance and symbolism.

Priests, others have more to celebrate than athletes

KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

Like many families across the United States, I spent part of Thanksgiving Day watching professional football.

When a zealous player performed a celebratory dance after scoring a touchdown, my brother-in-law Tim and I scoffed at his brazenness.

"I'm going to start dancing around for doing my job," Tim said.

Actually, Tim should do a dance when he does his job correctly. You see, he's an airline pilot. Every time he sits in that cockpit, he literally has hundreds of lives in his hands.

Aren't a safe trip and successful landing always worth celebrating?

Professional athletes certainly have reason to celebrate: most get paid millions of dollars to play a game. In my opinion, scoring touchdowns and hitting home runs are hardly worthy of back flips and mock swordplay.

There are lots of professionals who have legitimate reason to do back flips after doing their jobs: the heart surgeon who performed my father's quadruple bypass surgery; the paramedics who administered epinephrine to my mother after she was stung by 15 yellow jackets.

And how about Mrs. Rieger, my third-grade teacher, who introduced me to poetry and taught me look things up for myself?

I also can't forget my senior advanced placement English teacher, Mrs. Edwards, who told me never to use the word "very" — there's always a better word if you have to qualify it with very. Is King Kong very big? No — he is huge, enormous or gigantic.

More significant for me is Msgr. Richard Allen, whose meaningful homilies and pastoral spirit helped prompt me to join the Catholic Church.

Most importantly, there are the dozens of priests who have celebrated the Masses I've attended for the past six years, allowing me to receive the Eucharist.

So why don't we have a Father Foxtrot or Teacher Two-Step? How about a Pilot Paso Doble or Surgeon Samba?

If you think about it, I'm sure you can name people you think should celebrate — the people who have impacted your life in ways large and small. Your parents, priests, religious sisters, godparents, teachers and friends who have helped shape who you are today.

These people are certainly the ones worthy of their own "Super Bowl Shuffle."

As we head into playoff season, I fear the end zone celebrations will become even more obnoxious. Hardly what Jesus would do.

This Christmas, let's make our real heroes feel like dancing in the end zone.

Charitable gifts help strengthen Christ's work

As the end of the year approaches, the spirit of generosity abounds as we celebrate the birth of Christ at Christmas. This is the time when people traditionally choose to show their love and caring with gifts to family members, friends and other loved ones.

Many in the diocese also show their love of the church at this time with gifts that support their parish, Catholic school, Catholic agency, the Diocese of Charlotte or the diocesan Foundation. Those who give at year's end may also reap personal financial benefits as a result of their gifts.

Charitable gifts made to your parish, Catholic school, agency, the diocese or the Foundation before Dec. 31 may bring you savings at tax time next spring.

Gifts of appreciated assets such as stocks can also bring tax savings if you have owned the assets for at least 12 months. An income tax deduction for the current value of the property becomes available at the time the gift is made and capital gains tax will not be due on the increase in value.

A regular review of estate plans at the end of the year is a good way to include a charitable dimension that will provide future benefits to Catholic causes important to you, your family, your community and the church.

It is a good idea to discuss gift options with your professional financial advisor who can help you explore giving methods that are best suited to your financial position.

Gifts to your parish, Catholic school or agency, the diocese or the Foundation strengthen and continue Christ's work on earth. All gifts, regardless of size, are greatly appreciated during this Christmas season and throughout the year.

The peaceable kingdom given birth with Christ

Jesus thought outside the box; so should we

They were waiting, waiting for the mighty king. The one who would lead them with his fearful sword into battle against their Roman oppressors. And like his ancestor David, he would make Israel a powerful people among the nations.

In the ancient world where war was commonplace, it was reasonable that the majority of oppressed Jewish people would expect the Messiah — the anointed one — to be a warrior-king. Only those with open minds and humble hearts could understand that their God was totally unlike other gods.

These faithful few knew the Messiah would build his kingdom not with swords and spears, but with justice and love. He would usher in the peaceable kingdom as foretold by Isaiah the prophet:

"In days to come the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established as the highest of the mountains. ... All the nations shall stream to it. ... They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. ... They will not hurt or destroy on all my holy mountain; for the earth will be full of the knowledge of the Lord."

And so it came to pass. In the city of David, the Messiah, the Prince of Peace, was born. As God among us, Jesus would later preach about a kingdom so different from any other.

To enter his kingdom one would need to turn away from the thinking of the world and adopt a wonderfully strange logic: "To you that listen, love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, bless those who curse you, pray for those who abuse you. ... Do to others as you would have them do to you" (Lk 6: 27-28, 31).

Some 2,000 years have passed since the Prince of Peace proclaimed those words, yet as in the ancient world war is commonplace. We are not "full of the knowledge of the Lord." We are not even close.

Following Jesus' teachings requires us to be countercultural. If we sound and act like much of mainstream society, we have entered the kingdom of darkness, not the kingdom of God.

How can we possibly claim to love our enemies by bombing and shooting them? This is not the road to peace. It never was and never will be.

Making a Difference

TONY MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

Jesus preached nonviolence. He even loved those who considered him an enemy. Even when brutally beaten and crucified, he offered forgiveness not retaliation.

Yes, this is a very difficult path to walk. But instead of taking the dead-end road of violence and war, let's begin to think "outside the box," as Jesus did. With God's grace, creativity and good will, we can surely do better than bombs and bullets.

Pope Paul VI said, "If you want peace, work for justice."

Well, justice demands that all people have access to decent food, water, sanitation, housing, health care, education and employment.

Why don't we turn our swords into plowshares? Why not channel the billions of dollars we spend on war and war preparation toward meeting these basic human needs?

While this sounds like foolishness to many, it is of the same wonderfully strange wisdom that brought to us not a warrior-Messiah, but a Savior-King born in a humble cave in Bethlehem.

A 'calling from God'

More than 200 babies and counting for Omaha foster mother

BY JACLYN SCHULTE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

OMAHA, Neb. — In 1990, when Gloria Leiferman was taking care of her 100th foster child, many thought she would slow down.

After the death of her husband, Ronald, in 2002, many thought she would quit altogether.

But today she is caring for her 203rd foster child.

"I am really good at what I do and I am not going to quit until it is not fun anymore," said Leiferman. "To me this is my calling from God."

She has responded to that calling for the past 26 years, taking care of babies as a foster mother for Catholic Charities, Nebraska Health and Human Services and the Child Saving Institute.

A registered nurse by profession, Leiferman went back to work after taking time off to raise six children. While working in the intensive-care nursery at St. Joseph Hospital (now Creighton University Medical Center) in Omaha, she attended a training session at Boys Town on child abuse and neglect.

"From that I knew what I wanted to do," she said.

Leiferman and her husband attended a six-week course in preparation of their first foster child, who arrived March 2, 1979.

"I could not have done this for all these years if my husband was not supportive," she said. "Many people thought when my husband died that I would quit, but now I need a baby in my arms more than ever."

With her nursing background, Leiferman usually cares for children with disabilities or injuries, including babies born addicted to drugs and those who have been abused.

"When I read back through my notes I wonder how I got through it," she said. "Actually those cases are a challenge to me, so I like them best."

Hosting foster children in the Leiferman home also influenced her children. One of her daughters is a foster mother who provides therapeutic foster care for troubled teen-agers; her son is a pediatrician and two other daughters are teachers.

"All of my kids are great parents," she said. "I think (foster parenting) set a really good example."

The next generation, Leiferman's 16 grandchildren, also are being influenced by the foster children.

"The minute my grandchildren come to the door they race upstairs to see and play with the babies," she said. "It was good for them, too, because it taught them what it was like to have a baby around."

Leiferman, a parishioner of St. Leo

Church, takes her babies to Mass every Sunday.

She has seen many changes with the foster care system over the years. The babies today also are different — she did not encounter drug-related problems with any of her first 99 foster children. But baby No. 100 had drug-related problems, as do the majority of foster care babies now coming to her home.

One thing has remained consistent over the years — the feelings when a baby leaves.

"You have to go into it knowing that it is temporary, but you cannot hold back your love," she said. "Each of the babies takes a little piece of my heart with them."

Gloria Leiferman of Omaha, Neb., rocks her 203rd foster child to sleep, surrounded by photos and mementos of children she has cared for over the past 26 years. Leiferman credits her nursing background and a true love for babies as the keys to her success as a foster mom.

Breaking the cycle of poverty

January is 'Poverty in America Awareness Month'

BY KAREN A. EVANS

CHARLOTTE — More than 37 million people live in America's 51st state, "Poverty USA," as it is called by the Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CCHD).

CCHD is the domestic anti-poverty, social justice program of the U.S. bishops.

During January, Poverty in America Awareness Month,

CCHD will launch its sixth national awareness campaign. By focusing on poverty, CCHD hopes to remind Americans early each year that poverty remains very much a part of American life and that they can do something to help.

Of the 2 million children in North Carolina, 473,000, or 23.1 percent, are living in poverty. Among the 50 states and the District of Columbia, North Carolina ranks seventh in percentage of children living in poverty, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

While the White House Office of Management and Budget defines the average poverty threshold in 2004 as $19,307 for a family of four, a CCHD study showed that most Americans believe it takes nearly $30,000 to adequately house, clothe and feed a family of four.

A recent Gallup poll found that only five percent of Americans believe poverty and homelessness are important

SIMPLE PLANNING

Susan Bigcraft hugs daughter Kat before a day at school earlier this year. One way the Portland, Ore., family lives out the Gospel message each day is to embrace simplicity in life.

Family-first philosophy keeps Catholic couple on track

PORTLAND, Ore. (CNS) — He runs a big-city emergency medicine department. She negotiates the legal world for a Catholic nonprofit.

But for both, their careers take second place after their children.

Once a month, the whole household heads to the Oregon Food Bank to package food for needy people. Before bed, they say the Hail Mary.

The four members of the Carnevale-Bigcraft family are not angels. They sometimes find each other exasperating and on occasion lose their tempers. Now and then they even have messy rooms.

But fueled by the commitment of parents Dr. Tony Carnevale and Susan Bigcraft, they do take faith seriously. They also aim to take belief into the streets.

As a way of being evangelizers and living out the Gospel, for Carnevale and Bigcraft, the answer lies partly in embracing simplicity.

Early on, Carnevale decided against becoming an orthopedic surgeon due to its unpredictable schedule, which would have kept him away from his family.

Bigcraft left a growing career as a courtroom attorney and has opted to work part time as legal counsel for Oregon Catholic Press.

Though they could have bought into one of Portland's exclusive neighborhoods, the couple chose a modest home in a middle-income district.

Most days during the school year, Bigcraft and children Kat and Dante make the two-mile bike ride to All Saints Elementary School. There is no television in the house.

"I like to be simple," Bigcraft said. "I don't want to have a lot of things. Making a lot of money is not appealing."

Their countercultural choices impress people.

"The energy that it would take to put into a big-time law career she has chosen to pour into those children," said Bob Weaver, an attorney who hired Bigcraft. "She has an internal gyroscope that keeps her centered."

Carnevale and Bigcraft and their children are proud to go to church together. Sixth-grader Kat is an altar server and third-grader Dante, who received first Communion in 2005, will soon serve, too.

"They are such a family unit; that's what I admire," said Father Bob Barricks, their pastor. The priest noted that they even take part in the sacrament of reconciliation as a family.

"They seem to have their priorities straight," said the priest.

The parents realize the way they parent is a large part of their evangelizing. They do not intend to unleash perfect achievers on the world. But they have Gospel-based expectations for their children.

"I want them to be good people," Bigcraft said. "I want them to be happy, to make wise choices and to be accepting of others and of life in all its messiness. I want them to enjoy the journey, even if there are lots of mistakes."

Influential Jesuit says bad driving is sin, should be confessed

We have serious obligation to respect life, says priest

ROME (CNS) — Driving inattentively, after drinking or when one is tired is a sin that should be confessed, said the Jesuit director of an influential magazine.

Poor driving "places at great risk one's own life and the lives of others, certainly much more than seeing a provocative film, something people confess much more easily because they feel more at fault," wrote Father GianPaolo Salvini in mid-December.

The priest is director of La Civiltà Cattolica, a magazine reviewed by the Vatican Secretariat of State prior to publication.

Father Salvini noted that in late November, Pope Benedict XVI publicly asked people to drive more carefully in order to save lives.

While much of his article looked at statistics about driving habits and accidents in Italy, the Jesuit also looked at the moral, psychological and social issues involved in more and more people driving cars, mopeds and motorcycles.

Like any human action, he said, driving involves "a series of obligations deriving from justice, prudence and charity," obligations that are morally binding.

Unfortunately, Father Salvini said, most people — including church people — do not seem to give much thought to the moral implications of getting behind the wheel.

"There is a serious obligation to respect one's life and the lives of others," Father Salvini said. "It would not be a bad idea when examining one's conscience to look at this point as well."

The Jesuit said, "All educators, including the church, have a serious responsibility in forming consciences on this point."

Vatican's Christmas tree reminds people Christ has come, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The shining lights of the Vatican's towering Christmas tree should remind people that Christ, the light of the world, has come, Pope Benedict XVI told church and civic leaders from Austria.

The region of upper Austria donated the 98-foot tree, which was lighted during a Dec. 17 ceremony in St. Peter's Square.

The pope held an audience with the Austrian delegation in the morning, while U.S. Cardinal Edmund C. Szoka, president of the office governing Vatican City State, presided over the evening tree lighting.

Pope Benedict told the Austrians, "At Christmas, in every part of the globe, the good news of the birth of the Redeemer echoes again: The awaited Messiah became man and came among us.

"With his shining presence, Jesus has shattered the darkness of error and sin and has brought humanity the joy of his blazing divine light; the Christmas tree is a sign and reminder of this," he said.

During the audience, the pope was given a lantern by 11-year-old Jurgen Lengauer. The Austrian boy lighted the lantern Dec. 12 in Bethlehem and was to spend the next several weeks giving candles lit from it to Christian leaders all over Europe.

Lengauer was chosen after he saved his 2-year-old brother from drowning in a swimming pool last summer.

Speaking at the evening ceremony, which featured traditional Austrian Christmas carols, Cardinal Szoka said the Austrian people donated the tree as an expression of their love for Pope Benedict and the universal church.

"The strength of the people of the mountains is reflected in this tree," he said. "From its birth until today, this tree has withstood strong winds and stormy blizzards, reaching a majestic and beautiful height."

SFO and the Franciscan way of life are invited to attend. For more information, call Tom O'Loughlin at (704) 947-7235.

Catholics, Orthodox have responsibility to work for unity, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Catholics and Orthodox have a responsibility to work toward full unity in accordance with the will of Christ, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Meeting Dec. 15 with a committee preparing for a full meeting of the international Catholic-Orthodox dialogue, the pope said he rejoiced at the desire to "take up again and pursue the dialogue which, over the past few years, had known serious internal and external difficulties."

The last meeting of the international Catholic-Orthodox dialogue was held in 2000 to discuss the role and theological implications of the agreements that led to the formation of the Eastern Catholic churches. That meeting ended without any conclusions or decisions agreeable to Orthodox and Catholics.

Fifteen autonomous Orthodox churches, meeting at the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople in Turkey, agreed in September that the dialogue should be restarted.

The decision, the pope told Orthodox and Catholic members of the preparatory committee, "constitutes a great responsibility. It is indeed a question of achieving the will of the Lord who wants his disciples to form a harmonious community and to witness together to the brotherly love that comes from the Lord."

Pope Benedict said, "in this new phase of dialogue," Catholics and Orthodox must work to eliminate the differences remaining between them and resolve "to do everything to re-establish full communion, which is an essential good for the community of Christ's disciples, as is underlined in the preparatory document you are working on."

The committee was meeting in Rome Dec. 13-16. Pope Benedict told the church officials and theologians that the full communion Catholics and Orthodox seek with one another is "a communion in truth and charity."

"We cannot be satisfied to remain at an intermediate stage," he said. Rather, "without ceasing, but with courage, clarity and humility, we must seek the will of Jesus Christ, even if it does not correspond to our simple human plans."

The reconciliation of the Christian community, he said, will come only "at the price of submitting our wills to the will of the Lord."

Pope names veteran Vatican diplomat as new U.S. papal nuncio

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI named a veteran Vatican diplomat, Italian Archbishop Pietro Sambi, to be the new papal nuncio to the United States Dec. 17.

Archbishop Sambi, 67, has served as the Vatican's representative to Israel and Palestine, where he helped arrange Pope John Paul II's historic pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 2000.

He replaces Colombian Archbishop

Gabriel Montalvo, who was retiring at age 75 after serving as nuncio since 1998.

Archbishop Sambi is known in church circles as an energetic and gregarious man with an ability to bring the human touch to diplomatic challenges.

Bishop William S. Skylstad, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said the pope had honored the United States by appointing such an experienced prelate.

A Christmas tree for Margaret Mary

BY CAMELA MANDALA

SPECIAL TO

THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

It was a Saturday afternoon in 1995 and Burnsville was beginning to sparkle with Christmas decorations. Christmas trees were lined up at an old gas station off the town square.

I was looking at the trees when a cheerful young woman came up to me wanting me to buy a tree to raise money for domestic-violence awareness.

I told the young woman, whose name was Margaret Mary, my husband and I always picked out a Christmas tree on our anniversary, and we were looking for a larger tree than the ones at the gas-station lot.

Margaret Mary said she would go out in the woods and chop down the biggest, prettiest tree she could find for our anniversary, and she would deliver it to our front door.

How could I not say "Yes"? She was so happy for us and genuinely wanted to surprise us with the best Christmas tree.

A week later, there was a knock at the front door. There stood Margaret Mary holding a beautiful Christmas tree she had just cut down.

I invited her inside, and she noticed a picture of St. Joseph holding the infant Jesus. Margaret Mary said she was Catholic and had a young daughter. She was separated from her husband, but she was on good terms with him.

Margaret Mary said she was married at Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville. I told her that was the church we attended and how blessed we were to have Father Carl Kaltreider as a parish priest.

She replied, "He married us."

We just shared so much that day — like two old friends who had known each other a lifetime. She wished my husband, Ben, and me the best anniversary. She was so genuinely happy for us — and then she was gone.

We hoped she would visit again with her daughter, but that was the last time we saw Margaret Mary alive.

A few days later, I went to visit my daughter. I picked up the Asheville Citizen-Times and there was an article about a young woman, Margaret Mary Robinson, who had been murdered by her estranged husband in Yancey County.

Surely it couldn't be the same person, I thought. I had to get home to find out what was going on. My heart still grieves for the beautiful soul I knew so briefly.

How could this happen?

At the funeral home, she looked like Sleeping Beauty — a beautiful princess sleeping in peace.

"Did you know, she made her own wedding gown?" Father Kaltreider asked me. "She was the most beautiful bride."

We kept Margaret Mary's Christmas tree for two years — I didn't want to let it go.

We remember Margaret Mary every year on our anniversary and remember the lady who brought us the most beautiful Christmas tree ever.

This year, we celebrated our 50th anniversary. This story is for Margaret Mary, our Christmas angel.

She is not forgotten.

Christ plus Christmas equals joy

BY LORETTA POTTS

SPECIAL TO

THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

"Why do we celebrate Christmas?" I asked my grandson, Lucian, at the beginning of Advent.

"Because of snow," he answered without hesitation.

The brief conversation left me wondering how he connected snow with the Christ child.

Later, I was off to meet a friend for lunch at a café next door to an inn in Asheville. Our plan was to check out the Christmas decorations in the inn's lobby, which holds two gigantic fireplaces.

Overly decorated artificial trees lined the long hallway toward the lobby. Gingerbread houses dominated the left side of the corridor. Outside, enormous letters were mounted spelling out "Happy Holidays" and surrounded by lime green plastic trees.

"Perhaps they look better with lights in the dark," I suggested to my friend.

As we entered the lobby, a line had gathered near one of the fireplaces. Around the line I saw snow-white artificial trees lining the huge fireplace and a red sleigh in the center. Parents were lining up to take pictures of their children in the sleigh.

In the center of the lobby was a tall, white artificial tree covered with decorations as if to completely cover the branches.

We sat in the lobby a while, seeking Christmas atmosphere. No one said "Merry Christmas" to each other. Most were bustling around; one man typed on a laptop but worried about where his car was parked.

We sought a quiet lunch across the street. Although the tree at the café was artificial, at least it was green and tastefully decorated.

On the way home I noticed large inflatable snowmen competing with large inflatable Santas. No wonder my grandson thinks Christmas is about snow! Thank goodness I used 1-800 numbers and the Internet for shopping this year. Christmas spirit is not to be found in the commercial world.

Advent is a time of decision. This year, my husband and I decided to celebrate Advent by embracing the Jesse Tree tradition.

On the first Sunday of Advent, we put up our Jesse Tree family tree chart and began to read the Bible every night and apply a symbol for each reading to the tree chart.

As we read from Isaiah, Genesis, Hebrews, Exodus and Ruth, I began to feel the stories echo the history of our ancestors who waited for the promised Messiah from the root of Jesse. We have done this in the past, but this is the first year we have actually embraced this practice alone, without shopping and worrying about gifts.

Our Christmas tree sat in a bucket of water until we decorated it Dec. 17. Under the tree, center stage, is the crèche. Baby Jesus will be "born" in the manger on Dec. 25, and not before.

Although Christmas in the commercial world is gone, we must beg our God that it reigns in our hearts so that we receive joy the world does not know. As Father Richard Veras says in the Advent Magnificat Companion, "Advent is a time of waiting, longing, and begging. It is a time to pray, 'Come, Lord Jesus.'"

Bishop Curlin suggests prayer during Advent retreat

BY FRANK RYDER

SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

MINT HILL — How do people see with the eyes of Christ?

It was a question that Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin asked of 200 people attending the Advent reflection retreat at St. Luke Church in Mint Hill Dec. 10.

"We must recognize our own weaknesses and recognize the sin in our lives," said Bishop Curlin, the guest speaker.

"Preparing for Christmas is not just decorating a tree; it's preparing our souls," he said.

During his talk, Bishop Curlin shared stories about his personal experiences as a priest and bishop, and about his friendship with the late Mother Teresa.

"The greatest agony in life is for no one to care," said Bishop Curlin. "(Like Mother Teresa) we must be present for someone dying and hurting. We must be living tabernacles of Jesus."

Bishop Curlin challenged the attendees to be more prayerful, relating that prayer had given him strength during his encounters with sickness, violence and poverty.

"God will get inside of you and you will see things differently," said Bishop Curlin.

Ascension, St. Luke Church's teen choir, performed reflective music and a dramatic skit about eight travelers whose journey home for Christmas is delayed on a broken-down bus.

After several hours of disgruntled bickering, one optimistic passenger convinces the others to recognize the goodness in one another. They all make it home safely.

After the retreat, Father James Hawker, pastor, and the parish worship and spiritual life committee presented Bishop Curlin with a new red vestment.

2005: A REVIEW

The death of Pope John Paul II was a global event watched by countless people around the world. The man who had traveled the world touching the hearts of millions made his final dramatic journey through a packed St. Peter's Square April 4. A young girl, above, expresses her affection by blowing a kiss.

Pope's death, papal election voted top new stories in 2005 the past 26 years, again took the top spot, followed closely by his successor, Pope Benedict. The evacuees of Hurricane Katrina were third.

The Eucharist also made the editors' list of top 10 stories. The Year of the Eucharist, proclaimed by Pope John Paul II, ended in October with the Synod of Bishops on the Eucharist at the Vatican.

In celebration of the Year of the Eucharist, the Diocese of Charlotte held a number of eucharistic events, culminating with the first diocesan Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte Sept. 23-24.

An estimated 7,000 people attended the two-day event of prayer, praise, worship and music centered on the Eucharist. A highlight of the congress was the eucharistic procession, with approximately 3,500 people joining Bishop Peter J. Jugis as he carried a monstrance through uptown Charlotte.

"The whole Eucharistic Congress far exceeded my expectations," said Bishop Jugis. "The response was significant in that the people of our diocese were hungering for an event of this sort where they could come together to celebrate their faith and love for the Lord."

A second Eucharistic Congress is scheduled for Oct. 6-7, 2006.

A time of transition

The death of Pope John Paul II and the election of Pope Benedict XVI last April marked a critical transition for the church and attracted world interest.

For Catholics, the passing of Pope

John Paul at age 84 signified the end of an era. His 26-year pontificate was historic in terms of pastoral outreach, social involvement and global political impact.

To many, the Polish-born pontiff made the deepest impression in his final days, at the end of his dramatic struggle with infirmity. The pope, who had Parkinson's disease, experienced a breathing crisis and was rushed to Rome's Gemelli hospital in February, where doctors performed a tracheotomy.

His recovery was slow, and at the end of March a feeding tube was placed through his nose to aid nutrition. On March 31, the pope suffered septic shock and heart failure. He was treated with respiratory equipment in the Vatican, slipping in and out of consciousness.

Immediately, people began streaming toward St. Peter's Square to pray outside his window. When the pope's death was finally announced late April 2, more than 100,000 pilgrims had filled the square.

The pope's death set in motion a period of official mourning and reflection that culminated in the election of his successor. Time-honored traditions were followed, but in some ways this papal transition was like no other in history.

For one thing, more than 2 million mourners filled the area around the Vatican when the pope's body was laid out in St. Peter's Basilica for public viewing. People waited up to 12 hours to pay their respects, and many took photos on their cell phones when they approached the papal bier — a practice that broke traditional rules but was tolerated by Vatican guards.

Another change was the unprecedented global media coverage. Networks devoted hours of broadcast time to the accomplishments of Pope John Paul and to the choices facing the College of Cardinals.

The pope's funeral April 8 was attended by royalty and world leaders — including U.S. President George W. Bush — and by representatives of other Christian churches and non-Christian faiths.

Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, dean of the College of Cardinals, was the main celebrant and also chaired the daily closed-door meetings of the cardinals before the conclave. Soon the German cardinal, who had headed the Vatican's doctrinal congregation for 24 years, was being seriously discussed as a papal candidate.

In a sermon the morning before the conclave opened, Cardinal Ratzinger strongly denounced what he called a modern "dictatorship of relativism" and compared the church to a boat buffeted by ideology, selfishness and human trickery.

His words were still ringing in people's ears when, two days later on April 19, whitish-gray smoke poured out of the Sistine Chapel smokestack and St. Peter's Basilica bell confirmed that a new pope had been elected.

Soon afterward, the new pope walked onto the balcony, smiling broadly and holding up both hands as the packed square broke into cheering and applause. Cardinal Ratzinger, now Pope Benedict XVI, called himself "a simple, humble worker in the vineyard of the Lord."

Celebrating Mass the next day, the new pope pledged he would follow Pope John Paul's path of ecumenism and dialogue, under the guidance of the Second Vatican Council. In the days to come, the pope would also make clear that his personal style would differ from that of his gregarious, globe-trotting predecessor.

With Pope Benedict's inaugural Mass April 24, the papal transition officially ended. But in a less formal way, it continued throughout the year as long lines of pilgrims came to pray before Pope John Paul's tomb beneath St. Peter's Basilica and as record crowds arrived to see the new pope.

Severe disasters

Hurricanes. Earthquakes. Tsunamis. Floods. Tornadoes.

The past year may go down as one of history's worst for natural disasters.

At the start of the year, disaster relief efforts were just beginning for the millions of people in southern Asia affected by one of the worst tsunamis in history that struck Dec. 26, 2004. The official death toll eventually rose to more than 180,000, with almost 50,000 more missing and believed dead.

At year's end, New Orleans was still in the early stages of recovery from the floods that followed after Hurricane Katrina hit Aug. 29. The hurricane also devastated towns and cities along the coast of Mississippi.

Hurricane Katrina is regarded as the worst natural disaster ever to hit the United States in terms of the economic damage — estimated at $80 billion — and the thousands of New Orleanians and others facing long-term displacement because of the destruction of their homes and neighborhoods.

Its death toll, estimated at about 1,200, made it the deadliest U.S. storm since a September 1928 hurricane that hit Florida, killing more than 1,800.

In October a severe earthquake in Pakistan, also affecting India to the south and Afghanistan to the north, left more than 80,000 dead and an estimated 3 million homeless.

Pope Benedict appealed to the world community to respond generously to the earthquake victims, as they had to the tsunami and hurricane victims earlier in the year.

Catholic relief efforts reached record levels in the face of those and other disasters.

While Katrina's blow was the worst, several other 2005 storms caused severe damage and some deaths in the United States and elsewhere.

Year of the Eucharist

Although Pope Benedict XVI inherited the Year of the Eucharist and the Synod of Bishops on the Eucharist from Pope John Paul II, the new pope left his mark on both.

The Year of the Eucharist ended Oct. 23 at the closing Mass of the synod — a gathering Pope Benedict had shortened by one week while increasing the time for "free discussion" among bishops.

In the preceding six months, Pope Benedict led a Corpus Christi procession in Rome, presided over a Mass for the Italian eucharistic congress and shared his personal experience of the Eucharist, explaining the central importance of the sacrament in the life of the church and of individual believers.

In his homily on the May 26 feast of the Body and Blood of Christ, Pope Benedict said, "One cannot eat the risen Lord present in the figure of bread as if it were simply a piece of bread."

Communion "is truly an encounter between two persons; it is allowing oneself to be penetrated by the life of the one who is Lord, the one who is my creator and redeemer," he said.

The Oct. 2-23 world Synod of Bishops on the Eucharist ended with a call for Catholics to approach the sacrament with awe and allow it to transform their lives and the life of the world.

In an unusual move, Pope Benedict authorized publication of the proposals synod members had drawn up for his eyes only.

Schindler Schiavo in Florida was demonstrating just the opposite — and leaving many Americans with questions about end-of-life medical care and their own eventual deaths.

Schiavo's death March 31 drew attention also to the growing acceptance of assisted suicide and euthanasia in the United States and worldwide, and to "a culture in which human life is increasingly devalued and violated," as one U.S. cardinal put it.

In the fall, the U.S. Supreme Court heard oral arguments in a challenge to the assisted suicide law in Oregon, the only state where it is legal. That case hinges on whether then-U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft was right to declare that assisted suicide was not a legitimate medical purpose and physicians who prescribe drugs under the Oregon law could be prosecuted under federal drug control statutes.

Schiavo, who had been in what doctors described as a persistent vegetative state since 1990, when her brain was deprived of oxygen after her heart stopped, died March 31, nearly two weeks after her feeding tube was removed. Her parents, Bob and Mary Schindler, had fought a seven-year legal battle with her estranged husband, Michael Schiavo, over the right to make medical decisions for her.

Opinions varied widely about Schiavo's precise medical condition, her responses or lack of them to outside stimuli and her preferences with regard to life-sustaining measures sometimes deemed "extraordinary," such as the feeding tube that kept the 41-year-old woman alive.

Those working to keep Schiavo on the feeding tube found support for their cause in an address by Pope John Paul at a 2004 conference on end-of-life medical ethics.

"The administration of food and water, even when provided by artificial means," should be considered morally obligatory, the pope said, as long as it provides nourishment and relieves suffering for the patient.

Cardinal Renato Martino, head of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, called Schiavo's death two days before Pope John Paul's "a homicide in which it is impossible to idly stand by without becoming accomplices."

Questions about when medical treatment should be considered more burdensome than beneficial to the patient sent many Americans scurrying to specify their wishes in living wills, advance medical directives or other legal documents.

But many ethicists consider those documents secondary to the need for ongoing conversations among family members and friends about end-of-life treatment decisions. And the Schiavo case apparently succeeded in sparking those conversations.

But challenges remained. Members of the California state Assembly considered legislation similar to Oregon's, which would allow patients with six months or less to live to request a prescription for medication that would hasten their deaths. Similar measures were introduced in Arizona, Hawaii, Vermont and Wisconsin in 2005.

Worldwide, the Netherlands continued to be the only country to allow euthanasia and assisted suicide, even for those who are not terminally ill. Swiss and Belgian laws permit it in some cases.

But new proposals came up in Great Britain, Mexico and before the European Parliament in 2005. And in another slide along the slippery slope, a commission formed by the Dutch government agreed to begin work in 2006 on guidelines under which doctors could legally euthanize "seriously suffering" newborns.

Changing faces, changing laws

With the death of the chief justice, another justice's resignation and the nominations of their replacements, the Supreme Court proved to be a lively source of news in 2005, quite aside from its jurisprudence.

By the end of the year, its makeup remained in flux, and it appeared likely that by February the high court will for the first time have a majority of five Catholic members. The two-person change also could signal a shift in the direction the court takes on narrowly decided issues.

Shortly after Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced July 1 that she would step down when her replacement was confirmed, President Bush nominated Judge John Roberts of the federal appeals court for the District of Columbia to replace her.

On Sept. 3, Chief Justice William Rehnquist died; two days later, Bush nominated Roberts to fill the chief justice's seat and asked O'Connor to remain on the court while a new nominee for her seat was chosen.

On Oct. 3, Bush announced his second nominee for O'Connor's seat, White House counsel Harriet Miers. Miers' nomination was quickly embroiled in controversy, fed largely by Republicans who faulted her lack of judicial experience and the limited information available about her personal legal views.

By the end of the month, Bush announced his third choice for the seat, Judge Samuel Alito Jr. of the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. His confirmation hearings are scheduled to start Jan. 9.

Roberts is the third Catholic to serve as chief justice. If Alito were to be confirmed, it would mark the first time Catholics have made up a majority on the court. Justices Anthony Kennedy, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas are Catholic.

Rehnquist's death and O'Connor's imminent departure from the court also will mean a change in what had been a somewhat predictable alignment of how justices vote. In many of the court's close rulings of the last decade, O'Connor's vote proved to be the deciding factor, with the other justices likely to vote 4-4 on topics such as abortion restrictions.

O'Connor was part of 5-4 majorities in major cases that upheld state restrictions on abortion; that permitted religious displays on government property; that allowed a state to continue providing nutrition to a patient in a persistent vegetative state; that allowed a state-funded school voucher program and permitted state remedial education programs to be held in religious schools.

Rehnquist was the last remaining justice to have voted in the 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision that legalized abortion nationwide. He cast one of two dissenting votes. He consistently upheld state laws that restricted access to abortion and to prohibit doctor-assisted suicide.

Rehnquist also consistently voted to uphold the death penalty as constitutional, including dissenting from a 2002 decision that declared it unconstitutional to execute mentally retarded people and the March 2005 ruling that overturned the death penalty for crimes committed by juveniles.

Deacon Richard Kauth dies at 58

DENVER — Deacon Richard Kauth, 58, permanent deacon at Holy Spirit Church in Denver, died Thursday, Dec. 15, at his home.

Born Dec. 6, 1947, and raised in Lexington, Ill., Deacon Kauth was ordained into the permanent diaconate in 1992.

"I found that Richard brought a special spirituality to this diocese and it was put to good use with the parishioners of Holy Spirit," said Deacon Ben Wenning, coordinator of the permanent diaconate for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"It will be difficult to replace the gifts that he brought," said Deacon Wenning.

Deacon Kauth is survived by his wife of 34 years, Sharon; his son, Father Matthew Kauth, pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin; two daughters, Sister Mary Catherine Marie Kauth and Sara Kauth; a brother and a sister.

A Mass of Christian burial was celebrated by Father Kauth at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte Dec. 20. Bishop Peter J. Jugis presided. Interment was at Belmont Abbey College.

The Kauth family asks for prayers offered for the happy repose of Deacon Kauth's soul. In lieu of flowers, memorial contributions may be made to the Knights of Columbus, c/o Holy Spirit Church, 537 N. Hwy. 16, Denver, NC 28037.

ARE YOU BEING CALLED TO THE HARVEST?

Then he said to His disciples, "The harvest is abundant but the laborers are few; so ask the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers for His harvest." (Mt 9:37)

I am praying that you will join me in responding to our Lord's request for more "laborers" in harvesting the abundant fruit to be found at Belmont Abbey College. Over 125 years ago the Benedictine Monks came south in response to God's call to begin His work in the vineyard of North Carolina.

He is calling you to place your hands upon the same bricks that were formed and put in place by these holy monks so long ago. I am looking for strong, dedicated, Catholic students to help realize our vision of excellence and virtue. Belmont Abbey is your Catholic College and God is calling you to the "harvest."

Book chronicles history of Catholic Church in Alaska

BY EFFIE CALDAROLA
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (CNS) — Dog teams driven by missionaries through the silent frozen wilderness is just one of the stories in a new book chronicling the history of Catholicism in Alaska.

"Alaskana Catholica: A History of the Catholic Church in Alaska," by Jesuit Father Louis Renner, is a reference work in an encyclopedia form with alphabetical listings of priests, religious, parishes and places that have made an impact on the faith in Alaska.

The book looks at a history that stretches back to the day in 1779 when a Spanish Franciscan celebrated the first Mass in Alaska near present-day Craig.

Father Renner spent more than 40 years working in the Diocese of Fairbanks. For many of those years he served as editor of the Alaskan Shepherd newsletter in which he chronicled the lives and deeds of many of the people who appear in his new book.

Readers get a glimpse of Ursuline Sister Scholastica Lohagen, a sturdy German-born nun who walked down the halls of boarding schools and orphanages in her sneakers, first at Akulurak and then St. Mary's.

She came to Alaska in 1934 and remained until her death in 1985, having skinned moose, processed salmon and done laundry in missions on the tundra for more than 50 years.

Others mentioned in the book include Dominican Father Urban Bates, who as a young man registered as a conscientious objector in the 1941 draft, and Presentation Sister Mary Clare Ciulla, director of Catholic Charities in the Anchorage Archdiocese in 1967 and "at the time, the only woman in the United States to hold that office."

There are plenty of stories of pioneers and tales of survival such as that of Jesuit Fathers Paschal Tosi and Aloysius Robaut, who ventured into Alaska in 1887.

These priests were willing to build missions from scratch, spend countless hours engaged in the rudiments of survival, and learn the indigenous languages that today are on the verge of extinction.

The book describes Jesuit Brother John Huck, who helped build the church in Emmonak, helped dry out the Catholic school in Fairbanks after the flood of 1967, and helped build the facilities for a Catholic radio station in Nome. At the age of 33, Brother Huck drowned in rough waters on the Andreafsky River.

There is a long entry about Little Diomed Island, first visited by Jesuit Father Bellarmine Lafortune in 1913, and a history of Pilgrim Hot Springs, near Nome, where a mission center and boarding school thrived, described by Jesuit Father Segundo Llorente as "an oasis in the heart of the unfriendly Arctic."

The book also includes a story about Talkeetna, the staging area for Mount McKinley climbers and site of St. Bernard Church, named in honor of St. Bernard of Menthon, trainer of St. Bernard alpine rescue dogs.

When asked what he left out of the book, Father Renner acknowledged that the book has a decidedly Northern Alaskan bent, due to the way the book project expanded from Northern Alaska southward.

"First, I began to think only of Jesuits and then Northern Jesuits and then early-day Jesuits," the author said.

But he began to realize that he needed to be more inclusive because the Alaskan church had no written history.

administering rights to everything he had written before his election.

Cardinal Sodano said contracts already finalized with publishers would be respected, but that in the future all uses of the former Cardinal Ratzinger's writings would have to be negotiated with the Vatican publishers.

In a separate note, Cardinal Sodano said the Vatican publishing house would hold all rights "in perpetuity and throughout the world" to anything written by Pope Benedict during his pontificate, "especially the acts and documents through which the supreme pontiff exercises his magisterium."

Pope Benedict met with the publishers Dec. 14. Many of them gave him copies of their latest releases, including a number of books about his election.

Companies holding publishing rights of pope's works meet at Vatican

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Companies that have held the rights to publish the written works of the former Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger met at the Vatican to discuss the limits and obligations of those rights.

The Dec. 13-16 meeting was called to discuss "common editorial policies to protect the thought of Joseph Ratzinger," said Jesuit Father Joseph Fessio, whose Ignatius Press holds the English-language rights to works written by Pope Benedict XVI prior to his election.

The meeting included a daylong discussion of legal issues with the publishers, most of which are based in Germany and Italy.

In June, Cardinal Angelo Sodano, Vatican secretary of state, announced that Pope Benedict had entrusted the Vatican publishing house with safeguarding and Mary brings peace; so can we

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

About 10 years ago I was on a business trip to Washington, D.C., and took the occasion to visit the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception.

Among the many side chapels, there were those dedicated to all the Marian apparitions and several international shrines as well, and I simply enjoyed watching people of all different races and nationalities as they revered their spiritual mother.

There was one small niche in the main sanctuary that I will remember best, however.

I was sitting in a pew directly opposite a statue of Our Lady of Mt. Carmel. Forming a backdrop behind the altar was a brilliant blue-and-gold mosaic displaying Mary in her heavenly glory among the Communion of Saints.

I couldn't quite make out an inscription on the altar because my view was blocked by the people standing before it in rapt meditation. But when they moved on to the next altar I saw it, unobstructed. The carved inscription read, "Mary Is More Mother Than Queen."

Mothers are typically peacemakers among their children, teaching the values of just treatment and fair play, often intervening when quarrels break out. As the spiritual mother of all humankind, Mary's peacemaking role is even more momentous, for through her giving birth to Jesus, the Prince of Peace, the reconciliation of all peoples, the restoration of fellowship with God and the establishment of justice throughout the earth are made possible.

Just as Mary presented her Son to the shepherds long ago, she now presents him to us. While the world's political, cultural and military struggles seem to indicate that peace will never come, Mary's prayerful intercession for peace is never-ending.

Thus Vatican II's Constitution on the Church ("Lumen Gentium") can say that she is "truly the mother of God and of the redeemer ..., not merely passively engaged by God, but freely cooperating in the work of our salvation through faith and obedience" (53, 56).

Since 1967, Jan. 1 has been designated by the popes as the World Day of Peace; throughout the West the day is celebrated as an opportunity for new beginnings. As Mary, mother of the church, continually brings the hope and promise of peace through her Son, may we, her children, bring reconciliation and peace to all persons in our circles of influence throughout the coming year.

Questions:

In what way has Mary, the mother of Jesus, been a mother to you? Into what specific situation can you bring Jesus' peace this new year?

Actor tried religious life way before 'Frankenstein,' 'Raymond' roles

BY LOU BALWDWIN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

PHILADELPHIA — Peter Boyle has spent a lifetime in acting — on stage, screen and television — and has just come off a nine-year run as Frank Barone, the quarrelsome father on the successful "Everybody Loves Raymond" TV show.

As a child, he acted in grade school, summer camp and high school.

The funny thing is, he didn't act at all when he was a student at La Salle College (now University) in 1953-58. But then again, he was a Christian Brother in training back then.

"All we did was study and pray," said the former Brother Francis de Sales, during a recent visit to Philadelphia, his hometown, to accept the Shining Star Award from La Salle's communications department.

Boyle left the Christian Brothers after five years, eventually settling into a career in acting.

"Theater and religious ritual are very connected," he said. "It's the using of an inner process to express an outer reality, or something mysterious."

As a young actor, Boyle likes to joke, his Christian Brother experience was an asset.

"It prepared me for a life as a struggling actor," he said. "When I first went to New York, I wasn't starving but I really got into that vow of poverty."

Boyle grew up in St. Francis de Sales Parish, which explains his choice of names as a Christian Brother. His first acting experience was in a parish Christmas pageant.

As a student at West Catholic Boys High School, Boyle went out for theater, he said, because there were girls from West Catholic Girls High in the productions. "It was a good way to meet girls," he said.

Despite that, and the fact that he was not the most diligent of students, he was also interested in the Christian Brothers, the teaching order at West Catholic.

"They were good guys, and so I became one," he said.

After deciding the religious life was not his vocation, Boyle eventually lit on acting at a time when Philadelphia still was a great theater town. Virtually all of the big stage productions had tryout runs in Philadelphia theaters before opening on Broadway.

"My parents always went to the theater, and I started going," he said. "You'd see actors walking around town,

A film worth producing and they looked like they were having fun. I wanted to have fun."

Boyle, who performed with Chicago's Second City Company, was rarely a leading man but had many memorable supporting roles in film. His own favorites include "Young Frankenstein" (1974); "The Candidate" (1972); and "The Dream Team" (1989).

In Mel Brooks' classic spoof, "Young Frankenstein," Boyle plays the genial monster. When the film was in production, he knew it was going to be good, but he never dreamed people would still be watching it 30 years later, and that a younger generation would be buying it on DVD.

"It is a great movie, and I think one of the reasons it lasts so long is because it was filmed in black and white," he said.

During the filming of "Young Frankenstein," Boyle met his wife, Loraine, then a reporter for Rolling Stone magazine. When they married in 1977, his best man was John Lennon. The couple now have two college-age daughters.

In television work, Boyle earned an Emmy for a guest appearance on "The X-Files." Overall, he prefers film to television.

"Raymond" is the exception. "It was shot with four cameras before a live audience," he said. "It was hard work, but very gratifying to hear the response of the audience. That's a great experience for an actor."

Boyle said he was lax in the practice of his Catholic faith for much of his adult life. That changed in 1999.

"I had a heart attack ... and after that, I decided I wasn't going to fool around anymore, and got myself back to Mass," he said.

Now, on Sundays he can be found at St. Joseph's Church when he's in New York, or at St. Victor's when he's in Los Angeles.

"The thing I've found is I really like going to Mass," he said.

Immigration bill would hurt nation, says bishop acted, would unduly harm immigrants and their families, even those who are currently lawful residents," he said.

"Moreover, the bishops are deeply disappointed by the bill's enforcement-only focus and absence of reforms in the U.S. legal immigration system that would address our current immigration problems more comprehensively," he said.

In addition to hurting communities and businesses, the legislation "would undermine our country's proud heritage as a nation of immigrants," Bishop Barnes said.

The House vote in favor of the legislation was 239-182. The Senate was not expected to take up the measure until February.

Bishop Barnes also had urged President George W. Bush "to publicly oppose the legislation and to request that Congress begin work on a comprehensive immigration bill which all Americans can support."

In a statement after the House passage, however, Bush praised the House "for passing a strong immigration reform bill" and said, "America is a nation built on the rule of law, and this bill will help us protect our borders and crack down on illegal entry into the United States."

Bishop Barnes said the legislation's provisions related to assisting migrants without legal status could put many church workers in jeopardy.

"The application of criminal penalties to individuals, including U.S. citizens, who assist aliens without legal status could jeopardize church programs which provide basic needs and lifesaving assistance to these individuals," he said.

"Current federal law does not require humanitarian groups to ascertain legal status of an individual prior to providing assistance," the bishop added. "However ... the legislation would place parish, diocesan and social service program staff at risk of criminal prosecution simply for performing their job."

Bishop Barnes said the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops also is concerned about provisions that would:

— Make "unlawful presence" in the United States a crime, rather than a civil offense, as it is under current law.

— Prohibit refugees and asylum seekers from obtaining legal permanent residence and citizenship if they commit "relatively minor offenses."

— Expand the "expedited removal" program for those caught in the United States illegally.

— Make it more difficult for long-term residents to obtain citizenship and restrict their ability to seek review of Department of Homeland Security decisions about their applications for citizenship.

An amendment authorizing the 700-mile wall in parts of California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas passed on a 260-159 vote.

The Mexican foreign relations department criticized the House-passed bill, saying that "a reform which only considers security measures will not contribute to a better, more integral bilateral management of migration issues."

Bishop Barnes said the legislation "has been presented as an antidote to our nation's immigration crisis."

"It is just the opposite," he said. "In reality, this legislation will only exacerbate the problem by driving immigrants further underground and compelling migrants in search of work to rely on ever-expanded smuggling networks to cross the border."

Carjacked nun helps attacker at sentencing made her a promoter of restorative justice, pushing for a lighter sentence for one of her attackers and working with him to change his life.

She'll never forget that night. When she arrived home from her job as a nurse case manager at Convent Hill Public Housing in Milwaukee, all the well-lit street parking spaces in front of her apartment were occupied, so she parked her 2001 Chevrolet Prizm a block away.

Then she spotted two men next to the car. "They opened the car door and shoved a knife to my throat and said, 'Car keys and money or you're dead,'" she recalled.

"I've heard over the years, don't offer any resistance, because that's when you can get hurt," she said. "So I just gave them my car keys and said, 'I have no money.' Then (one of the robbers) just shoved me out of the car, which was really a blessing, and said, 'If you scream you're dead, too.'"

As the two men sped away in her car, the frantic Sister Kahl ran home and called 911. At 10:30 p.m., after visits from police detectives and a victim-witness advocate, she went to bed.

She was awakened by a telephone call from the Milwaukee police at 4:30 a.m., telling her the two carjackers were apprehended after a police chase.

Sister Kahl learned that the two men were young Hispanics, in their 20s, who had been on the lookout for a car to steal and drive to Chicago.

"Raul" faced criminal charges of robbery with threat of force and operating a vehicle without consent. His accomplice, "Luis," faced other minor charges.

Over the next few months, Sister Kahl struggled with flashbacks. She lost sleep and suffered a bleeding ulcer. But she was also concerned about Raul.

"Initially my conscience said, 'I can't judge this man. Only God can judge him,'" she said. "But the more I got to thinking about it, I knew this man had to make restitution to me and to the community for what he did."

She had not heard of restorative justice, even though her plan for restitution had all of the elements of this modern response to crime.

Restorative justice is now part of the criminal court process in more than 300 U.S. cities, including Milwaukee. It usually involves healing, reconciliation and rehabilitation for victim, offender and the community.

In 2000, the Milwaukee County district attorney's office launched the Community Conferencing Program, which is based on the principles of restorative justice. It is directed by Assistant District Attorney David Lerman.

In May Lerman told Sister Kahl that carjacking was a serious felony and no such case had been handled through a restorative justice process in Wisconsin.

The first step in the process is for the offender to admit guilt, which Raul, 23, did during a July 19 court appearance. Lerman and Sister Kahl then met with him.

He learned about the impact of his crime on her and she learned about his troubled past. He has been on drugs and alcohol since age 14. He doesn't know where his father is, and his mother has served time for drug dealing.

On Aug. 11, Raul agreed to a contract drawn up by Sister Kahl, which outlined steps he must take to avoid a long prison sentence. At a Sept. 7 sentencing hearing, Sister Kahl pleaded Raul's case and said that simply imprisoning him would not change his behavior.

Raul's contract included drug and alcohol rehabilitation; commitment to a community support program, such as Alcoholics Anonymous; attainment of a high school equivalency diploma; and job training. He also had to take a pledge of nonviolence through a program to be administered by Sister Kahl.

The judge was skeptical and told Raul, "This woman, for some reason that I don't understand, has hope in you. You are one lucky man."

Raul was initially sentenced to 10 years in prison but the judge ordered him to serve one year at a correctional facility, followed by four years of probation. If he violates his contract with Sister Kahl or the terms of his parole, he will go back to prison to complete the 10-year sentence.

In sessions with Raul, Sister Kahl encourages him to reconnect with his religious upbringing and turn to God for guidance.

"After we finish working on this, he's no longer going to be the same person and I'm no longer going to be the same," she said.

problems for the country.

Breaking the cycle of poverty in the United States is a primary concern for the U.S. Catholic bishops. The mission of CCHD is to address the root causes of poverty through promotion and support of community-controlled, self-help organizations and education.

"In 1970, the U.S. Bishops thought that poverty could be eliminated when they initiated CCHD as a 'temporary' domestic program," said Terri Jarina, program director for the Office of Justice and Peace of Catholic Social Services in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"They soon realized that poverty is quite complex, and in recent years the CCHD focus has been on breaking the cycle of poverty," she said.

CCHD supports local groups involved in creating jobs, improving neighborhoods, training adults for employment at a living wage, keeping schools safe and enriching for children, and raising leaders for the future.

The success of CCHD is due to Catholic parishioners whose contributions to the annual appeal make meeting CCHD's objectives possible.

"As we entered the new millennium, CCHD launched the PovertyUSA Web site to present all the complexities of poverty and the hope associated with breaking that cycle in many areas of our country," said Jarina. "We see evidence of that hope through the three national and 11 local grants awarded in 2005 to groups in our diocese."

Jarina encourages people in the diocese to help others in North Carolina escape Poverty USA.

Season of the lists

Media interest in popes, church high in 2005

It would be nice if a local TV news-cast started off by saying, "There were no fires or traffic wrecks today, the mayor is visiting his mother in Pittsboro and, because no one has been dialing 911, the police have been on break at the doughnut shop since morning. So we're going take the night off and put on a 'Happy Days' rerun."

There is usually so little news during the last week of the year that a "news-cast" such as that would be a welcome possibility. But don't hold your breath. Manufacturing plants can shut down and millions of people can take holiday trips that empty homes, schools and offices, but the news media will still be churning out stories, even if no one is reading or watching.

The big favorite at this time of year is the "list" story — the top news stories of the year, the highest grossing movies, the bestsellers and, since this is the age of celebrity, the best dressed, the worst dressed and on and on.

The selection of the big story of the year is very subjective. My guess for 2005 is Hurricane Katrina. I know it is a myopic choice since the tsunami in southern Asia and the earthquake in Pakistan were far more devastating.

But Katrina happened here, to our friends and neighbors. It shocked us with the lack of storm preparation in New Orleans. It also changed a lot of minds about how capable our government is when responding to a disaster.

The big story for the Catholic Church in 2005 was the popes. Pope John Paul II ended his 26-year reign as pontiff, a shepherd proclaiming the power of God's love with his last breath. His courage in the face of death and his strength in proclaiming God's word, even as his body failed, were inspirational. His death left all of us feeling a little lonely.

The process to replace him was a model of decorum. Our new pope, Pope Benedict XVI, is universally held in high regard.

The story of the popes marked the first time in three years that coverage of the church was not dominated by the sex abuse scandal that erupted in 2002.

The sad inevitability of the death of the pope was something for which I and

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS

other diocesan communication directors had planned. Most of us had communication plans in place that would explain church teaching and history to the faithful as well as the news media.

Despite this groundwork, I was surprised at the massive amount of coverage that followed Pope John Paul's death on April 2. All things Catholic were of great interest to the news media. Reporters brought their cameras and notebooks to Masses as they related the depth of feeling both in the Catholic Church and in the world at the passing of a great man.

This wave of interest in our faith continued through the selection of Pope Benedict.

Many of the same reporters who called in the past with difficult questions about the abuse scandal were now asking if they could cover a Mass or speak to Bishop Peter J. Jugis about his memories of Pope John Paul. This turnabout reveals an essential truth about the news media — it is neither friend nor foe.

Good news or bad, the ubiquitous cameras, notebooks and questions are going to be there whether the story is a solemn farewell to a religious leader or a scandal.

For me, the reporters are generally professional, no matter what subject they are covering. But it is, of course, a lot easier to explain the College of Cardinals than the John Jay Study of abuse in the church.

Hopefully 2006 will bring health and happiness to our new pope and to the people of God who are seeking answers either with a prayer book or a reporter's notebook.

Stand up — God's grace may be knocking at the door

Editor's note: This column was originally printed in December 2004.

The child was 2 years old when he lost his ability to walk. He had been walking since 11 months, but one day he began to wobble and fell down, unable to get up.

The child was diagnosed with Legg-Calve-Perthes Disease, which is, in simple terms, the unexplained interruption of blood to the head of the femur (thighbone). The result is degeneration and deformity of the thighbone area. When the doctors showed the X-rays, the parents saw blackness — nothingness — where their child's thighbone and hips were supposed to meet.

The wobble was probably the result of inflammation of the joint lining, resulting in a painful limp developed suddenly over a few hours. The only course of action was to establish a new blood supply to the affected areas. The child's legs were placed in metal braces with a rod to hold them apart and motionless while the damage repaired itself hopefully over the next 18 to 24 months.

Although much about the disease was unknown at the time, the doctors were optimistic because the child was diagnosed early; if treated early and correctly, 60-70 percent of children with the disease recover with no long-term disability. The only thing the parents and family could do was pray their only child would recover.

The boy remained in the braces for two years, unable to stand or walk. By 4 years of age, he still crawled on the floor, dragging his metal-encased legs behind him.

At Christmastime, he and his parents customarily gathered with their family at the child's grandparents' apartment in Brooklyn, N.Y. At least a dozen people sat around the table, enjoying a feast prepared by the grandmother, who sat at the head of the table.

She had always been a religious woman, the grandmother; always active in her church, always saying countless prayers for her family, friends and fellow parishioners. She was sitting quietly, looking down, when there were three loud, distinct knocks at the front door.

Nobody seemed to hear them, except the child's mother. She glanced to her mother-in-law, who, still looking down, nodded in silent satisfaction. The child's mother was confused — no one else had reacted to the knocks — so she leaned across the table.

"I think there's someone at the door," the mother whispered.

The grandmother looked up. "No," she said softly. "I'll tell you about it later."

When the mother and grandmother were finally alone, the grandmother explained she had just finished a novena — a nine-day series of prayers — to St. Martin de Porres. The saint, the grandmother said, had just given her his response.

"Your son will be healed within six months," the grandmother said.

The mother wasn't sure what to think, but couldn't deny the knocks she had heard.

X-rays of the child were taken several months later. The hip areas — formerly black holes — were replaced with bone. Within six months of the knocks on the door, the child was out of his braces. He was not only standing but walking, running. He became one of the fastest runners at his school.

Murray's Musings

KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

That Christmas miracle happened 30 years ago. That was my grandmother, my mother. I was the child.

My grandmother, Katherine Murray, died in 1987. They say she died peacefully, sitting upright in a chair while praying the rosary. The paramedics told my father they had never seen anyone so at peace.

Unfortunately I didn't learn about St. Martin de Porres' involvement in my condition until after my grandmother's death. The saint, born in Lima, Peru, in 1579, became a lay brother at the Dominican friary at Lima where he served, among other things, over the Dominican's infirmary and became known for his tender care of the sick and for his spectacular, often miraculous cures (including raising the dead).

St. Martin had a great desire to go on foreign missions but instead made a martyr out of his body, devoting himself to ceaseless and severe penances. In turn, God endowed him with many wondrous gifts, including aerial flights and bilocation.

Since moving to the South, I've heard many people scoff at the notion of "praying to saints" and intercessory prayers. One Baptist, who didn't know my story, told me Catholics wasted their time praying to dead saints who were "no better than anybody else."

Perhaps. And perhaps the metal braces clamped to my legs would have worked without St. Martin's intervention.

But two people heard those knocks on the door, and they believed. I don't really need any more convincing than that. But whenever I'm in doubt, all I have to do is stand up. The power of heaven seems a little bit closer when I do.

It's a pity there are so many in this world who don't have faith, who don't know, or refuse to know, the effect a simple prayer can have, or the grace our Lord is willing to give. God does listen to our prayers. But do we always listen when he speaks to us?

We had better start listening — we don't want to miss the knocking at the door. You never know who it might be.

I don't run quite like I used to, but before I gather with my family this Christmas, I think I'll go for a quick sprint around the block. I know my grandmother will be smiling down as I dash about.

And while I'm out there, I think I'll have some grateful words for a certain Dominican saint and offer some prayers for those I love.

Poverty in America

Much can be done to break poverty's cycle

The Catholic Campaign for Human Development has designated January as Poverty in America Awareness Month. During this month, CCHD strives to heighten the nation's understanding of the breadth and depth of the problems of poverty.

One in six children and one in 10 families live in poverty in the United States. Children in America have higher poverty rates than adults, and people 65 and over have higher chronic poverty rates and lower exit rates than children or adults, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

In 2003, 7.6 million American families — 10 percent of all families — were in poverty. That is an increase from 7.2 million, or 9.6 percent, in 2002.

More than two-thirds of all poor families with children included one or more individuals who worked in 2003. What's more, family members in working-poor families with children typically worked combined totals of only 46 weeks per year.

The U.S. Census Bureau defines poor families as those with cash incomes of less than $15,067 a year for a family of three — $19,307 for a family of four. In 2003, the average poor family had an income of $8,858, or $738 per month.

While the Census figures reveal a significant number of Americans living in poverty, many experts feel that the measures used by the federal government

Guest Column

TERRI JARINA
GUEST COLUMNIST

drastically underestimate the real scale of poverty in America — primarily because the official poverty thresholds are considered "too low."

Many analysts believe a more realistic poverty threshold for a family of four would be in the area of $30,000 a year — and that a more accurate estimate of the poverty rate in America would be 30 percent of the total population.

Making progress against American poverty constitutes a massive challenge. Many analysts view the nation's poverty as the worst in the developed world. In a recent study by the United Nations, the United States ranked last among 26 countries in the share of population below 50 percent of median income.

Among countries scoring better than the United States were Slovakia, Hungary, Poland, Slovenia and the Czech Republic. Rates in 14 European countries were less than half that of the United States.

Breaking the cycle of poverty in the United States is a primary concern for the U.S. bishops. CCHD is their domestic anti-poverty, social justice program. Its mission is to address the root causes of poverty in the United States through grants supporting community-based, self-help organizations and through social justice education.

The churching of new mothers

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN
DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. Our entire family was present for the recent baptism of our great-granddaughter. After the ceremony I told them that years ago, when our children were born, mothers had to be "churched" shortly after birth.

Apart from saying it took place in church and prayers were said, I didn't do a good job of explaining it. Our parish priest tells us he never heard of the custom. Could you explain churching of mothers? (New Jersey)

A. Part of the answer to your questions lies in the history of how churching of new mothers developed in the church. The ceremony, more properly called the Blessing After Childbirth, entered Christianity as a carryover of the Jewish practice of purification.

Under Jewish law many actions and events incurred a kind of spiritual contamination or "uncleanness," a condition that limited or prohibited the individual's involvement in the community's spiritual life. The uncleanness was removed by the passage of time or by a prescribed ritual of purification.

Included among the occurrences which resulted in uncleanness were almost any actions involving sexual functions, whether they were legal or illegal, sinful or not. A woman was unclean after childbirth, for example, seven days if the child were a boy, 14 days if a girl. (See Leviticus, Chapter 12.)

This uncleanness was formally removed 40 or 80 days after birth by the ritual of purification. We commemorate this event in the case of the Blessed Virgin Mary after the birth of Jesus on the feast of the Presentation Feb. 2.

In its later Christian form, especially since the Middle Ages, the ceremony was a way of thanking God for a safe birth and a petition for God's blessings on the mother and child and family.

Perhaps the main reason the churching of new mothers is no longer customary among Catholics and other Christians is that many of its prayers and blessings are now already implied or included in the rite of baptism itself as it developed and expanded after Vatican Council II.

The 1989 Catholic Book of Blessings includes a blessing ceremony for mothers who could not be present for their child's baptism so that they might "benefit from the blessing that in the rite of baptism prompts the mother and all present to thank God for the gift of the newborn child" (No. 258).

I'm not aware that the custom of churching is still observed anywhere in our country.

God is patient

New year offers new possibilities

New Year's Eve is one of my favorite nights of the year, because it is marked by two special words: gratitude and hope.

The ending of the old year calls us to gratitude, even if we have experienced losses and tragedies. "Give thanks in all circumstances, for this is God's will for you in Christ Jesus" (1 Thes. 5:18).

No matter what happens, nothing can separate us from the love of God. If we are alive and believe in the Lord, we have tremendous cause for gratitude.

The dawn of the new year calls us to hope, even if we have fears. When Jesus visited Martha and Mary to console them over the death of their brother Lazarus, even though he had been in the tomb for four days, the sisters said to Jesus, "Even now, I know that God will give you whatever you ask him" (John 11:22).

Even now. That should be our theme. As Jeremiah declared, even in the midst of the devastation of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, "But this I will call to mind as my reason to have hope: The favors of the Lord are not exhausted; His mercies are not spent. They are renewed each morning, so great is His faithfulness" (Lam. 3:21-23).

Yes, even now. Despite all the ills of the world at the dawn of the New Year, we are called to hope in the God who has not changed. Even now.

We can hope that our lives can change, and that the culture of death can change to a culture of life. The very fact that a new year is beginning reminds us that God is patient. He continues to give us time to repent.

We read in Luke 13: 6-9: "Then he told this parable: A man had a fig tree, planted in his vineyard, and he went to look for fruit on it, but did not find any. So he said to the man who took care of the vineyard, 'For three years now I've been coming to look for fruit on this fig tree and haven't found any. Cut it down! Why should it use up the soil?"

"Sir," the man replied, "leave it alone for one more year, and I'll dig around it and fertilize it. If it bears fruit next year, fine! If not, then cut it down."

We have a new year in which to dig around and fertilize the soil of our lives and our culture. Some people are afraid of making New Year's resolutions, because they don't want the unhappy experience of failing to keep them.

I encourage you to press forward with courage and to make them anyway, and here's why.

The idea of making a resolution is not that you will keep it perfectly. Success is not measured by "never breaking" the resolution. Success, rather, is measured by the fact that you renew the resolution one time more than you break it.

As we begin 2006, let us give thanks, and let us hope.

Real Christmas gift is bringing joy to others, not gifts, pope says

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — The real gift of Christmas is to bring joy to others, not expensive presents that waste both time and money, Pope Benedict XVI said Dec. 18 at Santa Maria Consolatrice Parish in Rome.

Joy can be spread in any number of simple ways: "a smile, an act of kindness, a helping hand, forgiveness," he said. By bringing joy to others, joy will soon come back to those who gave it, he added.

"Joy is the real gift of Christmas, not expensive things that cost time and money," the pope said during his first visit as pope to a Rome parish.

Santa Maria Consolatrice Parish is located in a working-class neighborhood on the eastern outskirts of Rome. The 60-year-old church had been the pope's titular church from 1977, when he was named a cardinal, until 1993.

Then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger frequently visited the parish to celebrate Mass and preside over confirmations. In his Dec. 18 homily, the pope thanked the nearly 1,000 parishioners for attending the Mass on the last Sunday in Advent and said his visit to the parish was "like coming home."

He said the "friendships and affection" that have been formed over the years with parishioners and clergy at the Rome church "warmed my heart and still warm it today."

The pope dedicated his homily to three key words or elements in St. Luke's account of the Annunciation, in which the angel Gabriel tells Mary that God has chosen her to bear the Son of God.

The first word is rejoice, he said of the word Gabriel uses to greet Mary. "The first word of the New Testament, therefore, is an invitation to be joyful."

The good news of the Gospel brings joy because it shows "God is not far away from us, unknown, inscrutable, perhaps dangerous," he said. Instead, "God is close to us, so close that he made himself a child."

In a world "dominated by fear, uncertainties" and where God is absent, the words, "be joyful because God is with you" open up a whole new world of hope, the pope said.

The second element the pope highlighted from the Annunciation is the angel telling Mary, "Do not be afraid."

While it might seem that Mary would be carrying the weight of the world on her shoulders, the angel assured her, "Yes, you will be carrying God, but God will be carrying you," the pope said.

He said Mary, too, is telling the faithful to not be afraid in this world "full of fear: fear of misery and poverty, fear of disease and suffering, fear of loneliness and of death."

The last element the pope highlighted was Mary's acceptance of God's will even though his plan for her seemed "too huge for a human being" to fulfill.

The pope said Mary tells the faithful today to be courageous, to say yes to God even if "at times it seems so difficult" to do and it may be more tempting to follow one's own desires.

But God desires the best for his children even if what he asks of them may feel "like an almost unbearable burden, a yoke that is impossible to carry."

In reality, God's will is not a burden, he said.

"It gives us the wings to be able to fly high" and to open one's life to God and his guidance, he said.

After celebrating Mass, the pope was driven back to the Vatican where he recited the noonday Angelus from his apartment window overlooking St. Peter's Square.

Before reciting the Marian prayer, the pope called on the faithful to devote time to silence to better hear what God is saying.

St. Joseph embodied a silence that reflected his deep "contemplation of the mystery of God" so that he would always be ready to carry out God's divine will, the pope said.

He added that St. Joseph's silence does not "demonstrate inner emptiness, but to the contrary, the fullness of faith that he carries in his heart and that guides his every thought and act."

Such silent, reverent reflection is "much needed in a world that is often too noisy, that doesn't foster meditation and listening to the voice of God," he said.

VATICAN CITY —
By any measure, it was an extraordinary year for Pope Benedict XVI.

Most of the world has followed the highlights through the lens of the mass media — his election in the April conclave, his visit to Germany in August, his growing popularity and even his fashionable ecclesial clothing.

On Dec. 22, the pope offered a personal look at the year in review. Although he spoke for nearly an hour, he barely mentioned his own

JAKARTA, Indonesia — A year after the tsunami disaster, the Catholic Church continues to construct thousands of houses for people in Indonesia's Aceh province, where almost all the people are Muslim.

"Medan Archdiocese is building schools and a center for people with leprosy, developing vocational schools and running rehabilitation programs for affected people in several parts of Aceh," said Coadjutor Archbishop Anicetus Sinaga of Medan.

Steven Gastriech, pictured with his parents, Bob and Maddie Gastriech, recently earned his master's degree in theology from the Sacred Heart School of Theology in Hales Corners, Wis. Blind since birth, Gastriech, now with his degree, plans to become a chaplain.

Blind man earns graduate degree, pursues work as chaplain

WAUWATOSA, Wis. (CNS) — Steven Gastriech, a 35-year-old who was born blind, had a hard time finding full-time work with his undergraduate degree in communications.

After holding short-term jobs, he figured "the church must want me" and pursued an entirely different course.

Gastriech looked into the programs at Sacred Heart School of Theology in Hales Corners in 2002, the year he also traveled to Toronto for World Youth Day with Pope John Paul II.

"There were some equipment issues," Gastriech said of his early weeks at Sacred Heart. However, by tape-recording lectures, utilizing the Notetaker program on his computer and with "excellent support from the library," he completed the required work and passed his exams.

He will receive his diploma during the school's May 2006 commencement.

Steven Shippee, chairman of the master's program at Sacred Heart, called Gastriech "remarkable" and a "very bright guy."

The theology professor also noted that Gastriech's presence at Sacred Heart provided "mutual enrichment for all" who are part of that community.

Father Ralph Gross, pastor at St. Margaret Mary Church in Milwaukee, said Gastriech is a cantor, choir member and participant in the parish's annual variety show.

"Nothing seems to stand in the way of this guy," Father Gross said. "He has a big heart, and he loves the church. He enjoys using his gifts and sharing them. I've been inspired by him."

This past summer, Gastriech became engaged to Carrie Krassman, a fifth-grade teacher, whom he has been dating for four years.

Gastriech said Krassman, who has a visual impairment, encouraged him as he endured job rejection and then pursued his graduate degree. The obstacle course that Gastriech has navigated has given him spiritual strength.

"It definitely challenged my faith life," he said. "It brought me closer to God."

The more he was challenged, the more he prayed.

"C'mon, God, what's your plan?" Gastriech would pray. "I want to know I'm using the gifts you've given me; give me direction."

He got that direction recently when he heard that he had been accepted into the first unit of the clinical pastoral experience program at Alexian Village in Milwaukee.

Should Gastriech eventually become a chaplain, he expects his life experiences will help him relate to those to whom he'll minister.

"These battles were forming me for ministry," he said.

Migration week to highlight solidarity with immigrants, refugees

WASHINGTON (CNS) — National Migration Week (Jan. 8-14) will focus on solidarity with immigrants and refugees.

In announcing the upcoming 25th annual weeklong observation with its theme "Journey to Justice," Bishop Gerald B. Barnes of San Bernardino, Calif., chairman of the bishops' Committee on Migration, said all people are called to make a journey "in solidarity with migrants, immigrants, refugees, human trafficking victims and other people on the move seeking justice and peace."

"Never has this call to solidarity been needed more than today," he added. "Too often those who have come to our land seeking a better life for themselves and their families face discrimination and exploitation."

The bishop stressed that National Migration Week provides a good opportunity for parishes and schools to address issues facing immigrants and to find ways to learn more or help others in their community.

He suggested that parish and school leaders could increase their awareness of these issues by looking into the Justice for Immigrants campaign launched this year by more than a dozen church organizations and the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The campaign is intended to educate the public, and Catholics in particular, about how immigration and immigrants benefit the nation; to improve public opinion about the contributions of immigrants; to advocate for changes in immigration laws and policies; and to organize networks that assist immigrants with legal problems. More information on the campaign can be found online at www.justiceforimmigrants.org.

The campaign's Web site and materials from the bishops' migration committee, on the Web at www.usccb.org/mrs/nmw.shtml, provide resources for parishes and schools to use during National Migration Week.

FROM THE VATICAN

In first eight months, pope attracts nearly 3 million pilgrims

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In the first eight months of his pontificate, Pope Benedict XVI drew nearly 3 million pilgrims to public events.

According to Vatican statistics, more than 2.8 million people attended the weekly general audiences, the Sunday blessings, special papal audiences or liturgical celebrations at which Pope Benedict presided.

According to the Prefecture of the Pontifical Household, 810,000 people attended Pope Benedict's 32 general audiences in 2005. Pope John Paul II's record for general audience attendance was more than 1.5 million people spread out over 45 Wednesdays in 1979, after his October 1978 election.

Since his April 19 election, Pope Benedict held special audiences with more than 250,000 people.

More than 394,000 people attended liturgical celebrations presided over by the German pope, with the majority of those people — some 220,000 — attending his April 24 installation Mass.

Nearly half of Pope Benedict's 2.8 million visitors attended his midday Angelus prayer and blessing. Some 1.4 million people attended the Sunday event from May through December, with the highest monthly attendance being 350,000 people in December.

While tickets are required to attend the weekly general audience, the Angelus address is open to the public without tickets.

Crowd numbers for the noonday Angelus dropped dramatically in August and September. The year's monthly average is about 250,000 people, but about 25,000 people attended in August and 25,000 people attended in September.

In the summer months, the Angelus prayer is not traditionally held at the Vatican, but in the small courtyard of the papal summer residence in Castel Gandolfo, south of Rome.

Pope says even embryo is object of God's love, concern

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — On the feast of the Holy Innocents, Pope Benedict XVI dedicated his last general audience of the year to the unborn child, saying even the tiniest embryo is the object of God's loving gaze and concern.

God looks upon all people with "loving eyes," even the "shapeless" human life curled inside a mother's womb, he said in his Dec. 28 general audience in St. Peter's Square.

The pope devoted his Dec. 28 catechesis to the last half of Psalm 139, in which the psalmist thanks God for having "knit me in my mother's womb." He said this psalm displays God's all-knowing and ever-present nature; even from the moment of conception, he knows a person's past, present and future.

The psalm also shows "the greatness of this small, unborn human creature, created with God's hands and surrounded by his love," the pope said.

The "benevolent and loving gaze of God's eyes already rest upon" the tiny, "shapeless" embryo, he said.

The Old Testament is replete with images of God as an artisan, a potter, even a tailor; he lovingly handcrafts people from "the clay of the ground" and "with bones and sinews knit me together," the pope said, citing verses from the books of Genesis and Job.

He said these images show "what a masterpiece the human person is," even when he or she has been "afflicted and wounded by suffering."

Whatever his or her size or condition, the human being is "a prodigy" of God and represents "the highest and most awesome reality in the entire universe," said the pope.

The Son of God "became man, rather, became a child, for our salvation," he said.

The pope greeted and blessed dozens of handicapped children and adults at the end of his audience as they were wheeled, one by one, up to him.

He had said in his catechesis that even those who are "weak in the faith and in Christian life are a part of the architecture of the church."

"It's true, they are imperfect and small; however, for as much as they are able to understand, they love God and their neighbor, and they don't neglect to do the good they can," he said.

Up to 28 more U.S. bishops could retire in 2006

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Following the Jan. 3 retirement of Bishop Basil H. Losten of Stamford, Conn., up to 28 other U.S. bishops, including five cardinals, could retire because of age this year.

There are 14 still-active U.S. bishops, including three cardinals, who have already turned 75. Fourteen more, including two cardinals, will celebrate their 75th birthday in 2006.

At age 75, bishops are requested to submit their resignation to the pope. Bishop Losten turned 75 last May 11.

Cardinal Edmund C. Szoka, 78, president of the Pontifical Commission for Vatican City State, has been the oldest active U.S. cardinal since July 2003.

In 2005 Cardinals Adam J. Maida of Detroit and Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington turned 75. Cardinal William H. Keeler of Baltimore will be 75 March 4, 2006. Cardinal Bernard F. Law, archpriest of St. Mary Major Basilica in Rome, will be 75 Nov. 4, 2006.

Bishop F. Joseph Gossman of Raleigh, N.C., who turned 75 on April 1, 2005, is among the other active U.S. bishops who are already 75.

Pennybyrn breaks ground in High Point

HIGH POINT — Pennybyrn at Maryfield, sponsored by the Poor Servants of the Mother of God, recently celebrated a groundbreaking ceremony.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis and Sister Lucy Hennessy, board chairperson of Maryfield Inc., participated in the ceremony Dec. 8. Construction soon will begin on 151 apartments and cottages in the Pennybyrn at Maryfield retirement complex in High Point.

"I am excited to see the mission of Pennybyrn at Maryfield continue to grow by offering more services," said Sister Hennessy.

Plans also include transforming the existing nursing center into six households surrounding a town square as well as upgrading the existing health care center.

"The new health care households will be part of the broader Pennybyrn at Maryfield retirement community and will provide a quality of life that doesn't exist in institutional health care," said Rich Newman, executive director of Pennybyrn at Maryfield.

The estimated completion date of construction is Fall 2007.

Aceh was hit the hardest by the undersea earthquake Dec. 26, 2004, and the resulting tsunamis, which slammed coastal areas of a dozen countries from Thailand to East Africa.

During prayers in Banda Aceh, the provincial capital, to mark the first anniversary of the tragedy, Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono urged people to remember the more than 220,000 people who were killed or left missing, including Aceh's toll of 156,000 dead or missing, reported UCA News.

Building homes, rebuilding lives

Archbishop Sinaga said local church relief and rehabilitation efforts received $2.1 million in funding from Catholic charities, especially Caritas organizations, including Catholic Relief Services, the U.S. bishops' international relief and development agency.

"In 2005 we handled the emergency needs by opening centers in Aceh and Nias to deliver food, clothes, medicines and tents," the archbishop said.

The church also used the money to renovate church properties and build schools and a 50-bed clinic.

"The church will use the financial aid for short-term and long-term programs for affected people in Aceh and Nias, regardless of background," the archbishop said.

Catholic Relief Services is building homes in Aceh and will be in the province for about five more years, said Ken Hackett, CRS president.

In a Dec. 20 telephone interview with Catholic News Service from CRS headquarters in Baltimore, Hackett said CRS workers have built more than 2,000 permanent and temporary homes for survivors and will complete about 6,000 permanent homes within three to five years.

The homes are "earthquake proof" and "raised above the ground to protect against flooding," he said.

Each permanent home, which is made for one family, has two rooms and a small bathroom with running water, he said, adding that for many of the poor the houses are "much better" than what they had before the tsunami.

"The community decides who are the most needy," and they get the housing first, said Hackett, who traveled to Aceh Dec. 10-18.

Even if available land does not have written proof of ownership, the community will recognize if a family had lived there before the tsunami and will consider the property owned by that family, he said.

Franciscan Father Ferdinando Severi of Sacred Heart Parish in Banda Aceh told UCA News Dec. 26 that his parish is "buying lands and building houses on them for Catholics who lost their property."

The parish covers all of Aceh, where close to 99 percent of the people are Muslim.

Long road ahead

Father Severi said the church would keep working with government and local and international nongovernmental organizations to return Aceh to normal.

He added that he used a lot of financial aid from Caritas to build houses, roads, orphanages and schools.

"We have built 27,000 houses, but many people still are in tents," he reported.

"We need two years more to handle" the large number of people affected, he added.

Father Mikhael To, coordinator of Sibolga Diocese's aid center in Nias, said the local church provided $400,000 as financial aid in 2005.

"With Caritas, Catholic Relief Services, the government and others, we are building hospitals and renovating Catholic churches in 14 parishes and mission station chapels, besides Protestant churches," he said.

However, he added, "We have not yet rehabilitated all the churches in mission stations; thus, Catholics there still attend Mass in tents."

Pre-kindergarten students delighted the audience with "traditional and not-so-traditional" Christmas carols, followed by kindergarten-through-fifth-grade students performing "Three Wee Kings," a musical about the birth of Jesus.

The program closed with "Puer Natus," a Nativity play performed by sixth-through-eighth-grade students and written by music teacher Tiffany Gallozzi.

Pope Benedict XVI reflects on historic 2005 election — a demonstration of the humility he has shown from the beginning of his pontificate.

Instead, he focused on the death of his predecessor, World Youth Day, the closing of the eucharistic year and the commemoration of the Second Vatican Council.

And, of course, on Jesus. Born in a manger, the pope said, Jesus has a power "completely different from the destructive power of violence," and far more effective.

The occasion was the pope's annual pre-Christmas encounter with the Roman Curia. The pope wore his red velvet cape trimmed with ermine, the Clementine Hall was decorated with poinsettias, and a Christmas tree was bedecked with lights.

The idea was to exchange season's greetings with Vatican officials; Pope Benedict gave them a nine-page speech.

Reflections

He began by paying tribute to Pope John Paul II, saying the late pope's fame as a world traveler and communicator only made his final days of suffering and silence more powerful.

Interestingly, it was a TV image that stuck out in Pope Benedict's mind: when the late pope was shown in his apartment the week before his death, gripping a cross as he watched the Way of the Cross broadcast from Rome's Colosseum.

Pope Benedict recalled his own first papal trip, a visit to Germany to preside over World Youth Day. But his biggest memory was not the cheering and chanting that greeted him from the immense crowd.

Instead, he said, it was the sound of silence — the "intense silence of those million young people" as they prayed together in a field before the exposed Eucharist.

The pope said the rediscovery of adoration in the church was also evident at the world Synod of Bishops in October, which closed the Year of the Eucharist. He said eucharistic adoration and the Mass were once seen in opposition, but that seems to have been overcome in the modern church.

Vatican II

The pope saved his most detailed analysis for Vatican II, which ended 40 years ago. It's a subject that has generated decades of debate within the church, including some critical comments by the pope when he was Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger.

The pope said there was no denying that the reception of Vatican II has been difficult for the church. In explaining why, he said there was a right way and a wrong way to understand the council.

The wrong way, he said, sees the council as a break with the past — a view that often has the sympathy of the mass media. Its proponents think the council's documents are imperfect, and so "one should follow not the texts of the council but its spirit," he said.

He said the proper understanding of the council, on the other hand, understands the council's reforms in continuity with the church's tradition and its basic teachings.

At this point, the pope went off into a lengthy and complex reflection on the church's relationship with the modern world. He said the council's great task was to help heal the rift between the church and modernity, in three specific problematic relationships: faith and science, church and state, and Christianity and other religions.

Given the bold statements that came out of the council on these relationships, it was natural that some would see only the apparent discontinuity with church tradition, instead of understanding them as an evolution of core Christian beliefs, he said.

But that would be to misconstrue the council's intent, he said.

"The church is, before and after the council, the same one, holy, catholic and apostolic church, moving forward through the times," he said.

Papal election

After the pope arrived to applause in the packed Vatican hall, Cardinal Angelo Sodano, head of the College of Cardinals, gave a speech that concentrated on the pope's election.

Pope Benedict mentioned the conclave in passing, recalling that he felt "not a little fear" at being chosen and added: "Such a task was completely outside what I could have imagined as my vocation."

He said that only with "a great act of trust in God" was he able to give assent to his election.

Last spring, after the 26-year papacy of Pope John Paul, many people needed time to get used to the idea that Cardinal Ratzinger was now Pope Benedict.

Eight months later, as he delivered a speech his listeners could ponder well into the new year, it was difficult to imagine anyone else sitting on the papal throne.

Angel on wheels

Founding resident gets custom golf cart for birthday

COURTESY PHOTO

Maria Morrow, the first resident of Holy Angels, gets behind the wheel of her customized golf cart Dec. 19, one day before her 50th birthday. John Olmstead, who helped build the cart, assists Morrow with her first driving lesson.

Holy Angels celebrates 50 years

BELMONT — A dream came true for Holy Angels' first resident one day before her 50th birthday.

On Dec. 19, Gary Babcock, owner of Carolina Golf Cars, presented Maria Morrow with a one-of-a-kind red golf cart, a project that was three years in the making.

"Maria asked for a corvette, 10 years ago, for her 40th birthday," said Babcock. "She doesn't have a driver's license, so we decided to build a custom golf cart that she could drive while sitting in her wheelchair."

The cart features a roll-up wheelchair locking device, horn, hand controls, headlights and Corvette decals.

"I can't believe it. It's a little scary, but it feels great," said Morrow.

Morrow was born Dec. 20, 1955, with complex medical needs, multiple disabilities and little hope for survival. Her mother sought help through a day nursery for children operated by Mercy Sister Marie Patrice Manley and the Sisters of Mercy.

With the sisters' care and medical attention, Morrow not only lived but also thrived. The nursery soon became a home for children like Morrow who were not expected to live.

Thus, Holy Angels was founded in 1956 and now provides residential services and programs for children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation and physical disabilities.

Morrow and Holy Angels celebrated their 50th anniversaries Dec. 20 by formally naming and dedicating a new intermediate care facility. Named Moody Place after Regina Moody, Holy Angels president and CEO, the residential home joins five other intermediate care facilities and two community group homes.

Larry Sprinkle, NBC6 weatherman and longtime friend of Morrow, emceed the birthday celebration and dedication, saluting and honoring the first angel for her strength, love and ministry to the many children at Holy Angels. He also celebrated with an official toast.

But the day before, Morrow was all about driving.

After a brief lesson from mechanic John Olmstead, Morrow test drove the cart around the Holy Angels parking lot.

According to Olmstead, the hardest part about building this particular cart was the wheelchair-locking device. The measurements had to be perfectly matched to meet the requirements of Morrow's wheelchair.

"I'm really glad I had the opportunity to work on this project," said Olmstead.

"This is a dream come true," said Babcock. "It's wonderful to be able to give this as a birthday gift to Maria. Doing things like this for others is what Christmas is really all about."

Sister Eileen Healey, Daughter of Charity, dies at 76

EMMITSBURG, Md. — Daughter of Charity Sister Eileen Healey, who served in the Diocese of Charlotte, died Dec. 5, 2005, at Providence Hospital in Washington, D.C. She was 76.

The former Eileen Theresa Healey was born in Baltimore and entered the Daughters of Charity Dec. 10, 1947. During her 58 years as a Daughter of Charity, she studied, taught and served as a pharmacist and a director of religious education in Michigan, Virginia, New York, Maryland, Washington, D.C., and North Carolina.

From 1981 to 1985, she served as director of religious education at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro.

Sister Healey also served as local superior at Immaculate Conception Church in Baltimore and at Rosalie Rendu House in Roanoke Rapids, N.C.

A talented artist, Sister Healey designed greeting cards and created original artwork for many of the province's meetings and special events.

She was serving in the pastoral care department at Providence Hospital at the time of her death.

'Letters From Rome'

New book offers inside look at Vatican II from late bishop's letters

BY PATRICIA KASTEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

GREEN BAY, Wis. — Want an inside view of what the Second Vatican Council was like, as it happened?

Bishop Aloysius J. Wycislo's newly published book, "Letters From Rome During Vatican II," gives just that.

The retired bishop of Green Bay, who died Oct. 11 at the age of 97, had been working on the manuscript for years — in fact, since the 1962-65 council.

The book is a compilation of letters that Bishop Wycislo, then an auxiliary bishop of Chicago, wrote from Rome during the sessions of the council. Addressed to his parishioners at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Chicago, the letters contain both tidbits about travel around the Eternal City and insider information about the wrangling between bishops as the various 16 documents of Vatican II were hammered out.

For example, during the council's second session in 1963, the bishop wrote, "It would be foolish to deny that there are differences of opinion here, theological and procedural, sometimes expressed with considerable vigor and determination."

Yet, he returned home after that session convinced he "saw real development and growth among the bishops, in the consciousness of what Pope John XXIII wanted of the council."

Bishop Wycislo, who attended all four sessions of Vatican II and gave many lectures on it over the years, kept copies of his letters and a detailed journal, always intending to compile them in some fashion. In 1987, he wrote "Vatican II Revisited, Reflections by One Who Was There." That book dealt more with facts about the sessions.

The new book, edited by Auxiliary Bishop Robert F. Morneau of Green Bay, gives more of the flavor of the council. Bishop Morneau was among many who encouraged Bishop Wycislo to complete the manuscript.

"I thought it would be a nice slice of history to get his take on those days of the council in Rome," he said.

He added that Bishop Wycislo's insights only added to his own admiration for what he and the other council fathers accomplished.

"What stands out for me," Bishop Morneau said about the book, "is the enthusiasm and the excitement of renewal."

In a talk with diocesan employees just before his death, Bishop Wycislo said he was still amazed by what Vatican II had accomplished.

Retired Bishop Aloysius J. Wycislo of Green Bay, Wis., who died Oct. 11, 2005, wrote a book offering an inside look at Vatican II.

"When I read the documents today," he said, "I'm amazed at what we accomplished ... the Holy Spirit guided us."

"Letters From Rome During Vatican II" speaks about those changes as they happened. A letter from 1962 talks about attending Mass in a church in Rome that was already experimenting with the use of the vernacular.

Another, dated Nov. 2, 1962, tells how the rite for baptism was being simplified.

"Less wear and tear on the baby," he quipped.

Toward the end of the book, the bishop noted, "Vatican II for me was not just a great heap of documents to be studied and debated but a learning experience I shall never forget. More than that, it was a special celebration of Catholicity."

Bishop Wycislo never tired of speaking about the council, which he was charged with implementing locally when he became bishop of Green Bay in 1968. He gave talks on it across the diocese and even taught about it to classes at St. Norbert College.

He firmly believed that the true effects of the council would not be realized for many more decades.

"We never envisioned this," he said in a 2004 interview.

"I'm amazed we voted and said what we did. That's why I say Vatican II is unfinished," he said. "We still have a lot to do to bring alive what we bishops intended."

We must listen for, answer Lord's call

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In this week's readings a common connection links Samuel, John the Baptist and Jesus.

We are most familiar with the miraculous circumstances surrounding the birth of Jesus. We can never hear too often about Mary's unequivocal "yes" to God or of Joseph's faithful action as he welcomes Mary, pregnant with Jesus, into his home.

Mary's aged relative Elizabeth and her husband Zechariah have long given up hope of having a child. Yet, the angel of God surprises Zechariah with the news that they will have a son.

Unlike Mary, Zechariah doubts the angel's message and spends the time between receiving the message and the circumcision of John without his voice. Finally, Zechariah's voice returns when he can emphatically say, "John is his name."

Long before Samuel's birth, his mother Hannah prayed fervently in the temple for a son and at the same time promised to give him back to God. Hannah was a woman of her word. When he was old enough, Hannah relinquished Samuel to Eli so that Samuel might learn to serve the Lord.

In today's reading Samuel hears his name called in the middle of the night. Each time Samuel thinks the priest Eli is calling him. The third time Eli realizes that it is God calling Samuel.

Eli tells Samuel to answer, "Speak, Lord, your servant is listening." With this answer Samuel begins his journey as one of the truly great servants of the Lord.

Twice a week they arrive in our parking lot. The drivers must extricate a series of multicolored bags ranging from gigantic to minuscule. Besides the colorful "luggage," each of these drivers may somehow have to manage an infant carrier swinging alongside while safely guiding a preschool child inside.

Occasionally, I am privileged to overhear fragments of their conversations as moms, dads or grandparents bring their preschool children to our parents-day-out program. I hear love in the voices. I hear trust in what the new day of discovery will bring.

At the close of the day, the process reverses. Children carrying original works of art reiterate their own accounts of the day's events. I am reminded of the grace of caring, faith-filled adults and the fleeting years of early childhood.

I wonder how many Samuels, Elizabeths, Hannahs and Zechariahs have been here today.

Question:

Who has been a voice of wisdom for you in helping you to listen to the Lord's calling?

Carmelite monks release new CD honoring Mary

BY JOSEPH O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

LA CROSSE, Wis. — The few lonely highways stretching toward the eastern edge of the Rocky Mountains in northwest Wyoming used to be the only way to reach the Monks of the Most Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel and hear their beautiful chants.

But now, thanks to modern technology and the release of their new CD, "Mystical Chants of Carmel," the monks have opened up their cloister in Clark, Wyo., with 14 chants dedicated to the Blessed Mother.

"I figured that since the people couldn't come to our Mass, we could share our liturgy with the world," said Father Daniel Mary of Jesus Crucified, prior of the monastery.

"The wonderful thing about chant is that it is a mystical form of music — many authorities believe it is directly inspired by God," he added. "Its primary purpose is to help people go deeper into the life of prayer. It settles in your soul and allows you to focus directly on God."

At the moment, the monks — seven in all — live in a four-bedroom farmhouse tucked away in the hills near Clark, a small town just a few miles south of the Montana border.

This may be the only Carmelite monastery with its own makeshift recording studio. With soundproofed walls and an engineering booth, they recorded their CD and then had a professional production team work on mixing the music and mastering it in surround sound.

The monks first came to Wyoming in 2002 at the invitation of Bishop David L. Ricken of Cheyenne. Father Daniel Mary said the bishop was looking for a religious order — specifically Carmelites — to set up shop in his diocese.

"His idea is to transform the diocese, to really bring people to God," Father Daniel Mary said. "To do these things, you need a contemplative community praying for the diocese."

While the CD was the inspiration of Father Daniel Mary, it was recorded under the leadership of Brother Michael Mary of the Trinity, the monks' choirmaster.

According to Brother Michael Mary, the album selections reflect one of the primary objects of their devotion: Mary, mother of God and patroness of the Carmelites.

"We wanted to put chants on the CD that really spoke about the soul of Our Lady," he said. "We took the chants into prayer with us and we would pray them during mental prayer times. Whichever spoke to our souls most, whichever gave us the best image of our Mother and her contemplation of Jesus, those were the ones we chose for the CD."

The monks learned the chants by heart to concentrate better on the mystical quality of the music.

"We wanted it to flow from our souls — and we wanted to bring that out in our style of chant," Father Daniel Mary said.

Proceeds from the sale of the CD will help the monks build a permanent monastery.

Colin Farrell stars as Capt. John Smith in "The New World."

'New World' barely worth discovering

BY DAVID DICERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — While the legendary love affair between Capt. John Smith and Pocahontas might make a wonderful film, the textured and visually exquisite but listless and long-winded "The New World" is not it.

Colin Farrell stars as the English adventurer, along with Q'orianka Kilcher as his Native American princess par amour. (At 14, Kilcher was slightly older than the real Pocahontas.)

The film opens in 1607 with English ships dropping anchor off what would become Jamestown, Va., while befuddled members of the indigenous Algonquin tribe watch from shore.

Smith is sent on a food-gathering mission upriver to the local chief, Powhatan. Smith is captured, but his life is saved by Powhatan's daughter, Pocahontas, who is smitten by the dashing, but considerably older, Englishman.

Against counsel, Powhatan allows Smith to stay the winter with the tribe, naively believing that he and the rest of the foreigners will return "across the waves" come spring.

The story unfolds like Romeo and Juliet in buckskin, as the two fall deeper into forbidden love, with Pocahontas eventually banished by her tribe as the hostilities between their two peoples escalate.

The film is basically a series of beautifully composed tableaux — realistically gritty while impressionistically poetic — held together by the star-crossed romance but saddled with pretentious voiceover narration and underdeveloped characters.

As a grand, tragic love story, "The New World" is dull, with long stretches without dialogue. The story gains traction in the third act with the introduction of the genteel John Rolfe (Christian Bale), a widowed tobacco farmer who competes for Pocahontas' affections.

"The New World" avoids the usual movie Indian stereotypes. If anything it is the fetid and rapacious English who are depicted as savages, while the "uncorrupted" Native Americans are presented as peace-loving, "lacking in all guile and trickery."

If you can endure its languid pacing, the film's eye-filling richness and timeless themes of love and loss make this "New World" still worth exploring.

The film contains intense battle violence. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Nicky made quick friends at school and liked to play football with the other boys, said Cornish.

"They miss him terribly," she said. "When he left, we gave him the school address and said we'd love to hear from him. He wrote the first letter and we continued."

Cornish's class and Nicky's new class in Mandeville have become pen pals. The classes have exchanged letters twice since November and plan to continue on a monthly basis, said Cornish.

The pen pal program is two-fold, said Cornish.

"They are learning to write friendly letters and how to communicate with another class," said Cornish.

St. Gabriel School is one of several diocesan Catholic schools that accepted

One of the students is in Cornish's class.

Accepting the displaced students has made real differences for all involved, said Cornish.

"They've made a positive impact through their presence," she said.

New stem cell bill hailed by pro-life official deputy director of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities, said the signing of the Stem-Cell Therapeutic and Research Act of 2005 by President George W. Bush "is wonderful news for the many thousands of suffering patients who can benefit from umbilical-cord-blood stem-cell treatments."

The House had approved the legislation in May by a 431-1 vote. The Senate passed it by unanimous consent Dec. 16 with one amendment; the House concurred with the amendment by voice vote Dec. 17.

"As Christians celebrate the birth of Jesus, how appropriate that we can also celebrate the medical miracles made possible by cord blood retrieved immediately after live births," Doerflinger said.

"Congress and the president have given a wonderful Christmas present to patients in need," he said.

Cardinal William H. Keeler of Baltimore, chairman of the USCCB Committee on Pro-Life Activities, had backed passage of the legislation in a July letter to senators, saying that stem cells obtained from cord blood had properties similar to embryonic stem cells.

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., chief sponsor of the legislation in the House, said after the signing that he had been working on the legislation since 2001, "and I am thankful that treatments will now, finally, be made available to patients in need."

"We will now be able to turn medical waste — umbilical cords and placentas — into medical miracles for huge numbers of very sick and terminally ill patients who suffer from such maladies as leukemia and sickle cell anemia," he said in an earlier statement.

'Congress and the president have given a wonderful Christmas present to patients in need.'

The legislation authorizes $265 million in federal funding for research and therapy involving cord blood and bone marrow. Of that total, $79 million would go toward the collection of cord-blood stem cells, with the goal of reaching a genetically diverse inventory of 150,000 units.

It also reauthorizes the national bone-marrow transplant system at $186 million over the next five years and combines the cord-blood and bone-marrow programs to provide a single information source for doctors and patients.

"Not only has God in his infinite wisdom and goodness created the placenta and umbilical cord to nurture and protect the precious life of an unborn child, but now we know that another gift awaits us immediately after birth; something very special is left behind — cord blood that is rich with stem cells," Smith said Dec. 17.

He added that cord-blood stem cells had been used to treat more than 67 diseases.

In his July letter, Cardinal Keeler said that stem cells from cord blood "grow rapidly in culture, producing enough cells to be clinically useful in both children and adults."

"They can treat patients who are not an exact genetic match, without being rejected as foreign tissue; and they seem able to produce a wide array of different type cells," the cardinal said.

"What is preventing far broader use of umbilical-cord blood stem cells is not an ethical concern, or any lack of evidence of clinical benefits, but simply a lack of funding and access," he said.

PROVEN RESULTS

Moral use of stem cells helps New York woman halt her cancer

BY KATE BLAIN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ALBANY, N.Y. — Opponents of embryonic stem-cell research often point out that using adult stem cells to treat disease is morally acceptable and has shown results.

Pat Picher of Saratoga Springs believes she's living proof of that.

Diagnosed with non-Hodgkin's lymphoma in 1999, she was treated with adult stem cells harvested from her own body. This January, she celebrates three years of remission from her cancer — the benchmark after which doctors predict that cancer will not return.

A homemaker whose husband, a deacon, serves at two parishes in the Albany Diocese, Picher was shocked to learn in the fall of 1999 that she had cancer.

Initially, she underwent standard chemotherapy for non-Hodgkin's lymphoma, a cancer of the lymphatic system — which produces white blood cells. The primary function of white blood cells is to fight infection.

She was told that if the cancer did not recur in three years it probably would not come back. Two years and nine months later, it did.

This time, Picher was given a much harsher form of chemotherapy — and was surprised when told that she would be a good candidate for stem-cell therapy.

Picher likened using adult stem cells to "a bone marrow transplant, but there's no donor." Instead, she had a special catheter put into her neck, then received a series of shots that caused her stem cells to be released from her bone marrow and circulate in her bloodstream.

Next, she was hooked up to a machine that performed a task similar to kidney dialysis: It filtered 10 million stem cells from her blood.

Half the cells were frozen for possible future use, while the other 5 million were kept for the next phase of Picher's treatment. She received high-dose chemotherapy to bring her white blood cell count down to zero; then her own stem cells were returned to her body intravenously.

"Then you wait for the stem cells to 'take,' and your white blood cell count to go back up," she said.

Many cancer patients struggle with the side effects of chemotherapy — nausea, vomiting, hair loss and more — but Picher experienced no side effects except exhaustion.

Picher believes that if the use of embryonic stem cells had been proposed, she would have looked at other treatment options instead.

"I believe it is morally wrong," she said of using living human embryos to retrieve stem cells. "From what I've been reading, there really is no solid proof that (embryonic stem-cell use) does much of anything. There's much more progress with adult stem cells."

"The media feel, for some reason, that they should glorify the embryonic thing, and there's no medical basis to do so," she added.

Since umbilical cord blood is also rich in stem cells and retrieving the cells from newborns does not involve taking human life, Picher would like to see more scientific interest in using cord blood.

"Babies are being born all the time; it's a readily available source" of stem cells, she said.

Two years after her adult stem-cell therapy, Picher was focusing on quilting, encouraging cancer patients who call her for advice and waiting for her three-year remission anniversary to arrive.

"Some days, I feel like I'm living on needles and pins, because this was the point (last time) where the cancer came back," she said. "But I never lost faith. What's going to happen is going to happen, and you can't do anything about it except pray."

End the Roe litmus test

Supreme Court nominees shouldn't be judged on abortion issues

On Jan. 9, the Senate Judiciary Committee will begin considering the nomination of Samuel Alito to the U.S. Supreme Court. The pro-choice Judiciary Committee chairman, Arlen Specter, promised that his first question to Judge Alito will concern Roe v. Wade.

Roe v. Wade created a nationwide mandate to allow abortion on demand throughout pregnancy, and erected an impenetrable wall preventing any legal protection of the child's right to life at any point in pregnancy.

During the first trimester, the court prohibited any state oversight of abortion. During the second trimester, the court merely allowed state regulation of abortion, and only to advance the woman's health.

After viability, the point at which a child could be delivered and survive outside the womb, the court pretended to allow states to ban abortion, but rendered any ban meaningless through Roe's companion decision, Doe v. Bolton.

Roe says a state may proscribe abortion after viability "except where it is necessary ... for the preservation of the life or health of the mother," but Doe broadly defines "health" to include "all factors — physical, emotional, psychological, familial, and the woman's age — relevant to the well-being of the patient."

As a result, no meaningful restriction of abortion is constitutionally permissible at any stage of pregnancy.

As a consequence of this extreme ruling, the court overturned the laws of all 50 states, including the handful of states that already had liberalized abortion laws to some extent.

Even Justice Ruth Ginsburg, a supporter of abortion rights, admitted Roe "ventured too far in the change it ordered."

The American public has never accepted the radical rule of Roe. In fact, according to a Zogby International poll, 87 percent of Americans support some legal restriction on abortion; a large majority (61 percent) support making abortion illegal after the unborn child's heart begins beating, which occurs around the 21st day after conception.

Only 13 percent of Americans support abortion for the duration of pregnancy.

Aware of the public disapproval of Roe, the Supreme Court attempted to resettle the issue in its 1992 decision Planned Parenthood v. Casey. While the court allowed limited state regulation, such as informed consent and parental consent laws, it reaffirmed a right to abortion.

Casey also affirmed the need for a health exception to any purported "ban" on post-viability abortions. Thus, even when a child could live outside the womb, abortion must be legal.

In 2000, the court decided that the Roe abortion "right" includes even the right to abort a partly born infant.

According to Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., this now is the standard by which Supreme Court nominees will be judged, the first hurdle they must overcome. They must affirm support for the right to abort a child at any point in pregnancy for any reason or no reason, even if the child is partly-born.

It is time to end the Roe litmus test. Visit www.endroe.org.

Christians believe history marked by progress in holiness, says pope

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Christians believe history is marked by progress, not toward greater wealth or ease, but in individual holiness and in the unity of the human family, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Christians are called to live with a constant attitude of giving thanks to God, but it is an especially important attitude at the beginning of a new year, the pope said at his Jan. 4 general audience.

In his main audience talk, Pope Benedict spoke about the hymn to Christ in St. Paul's Letter to the Colossians. The hymn offers thanks to God for the gift of Christ, the firstborn of all creation and the image of the invisible God, the pope said.

The hymn's profession that everything was created in Christ and for Christ "shows us something very important — history has a goal, a direction. History is moving toward a humanity united in Christ," Pope Benedict said, setting aside his prepared text.

"In that way, it is moving toward the advent of perfect man, perfect humanity," he said. Christ gives humanity his grace and the fullness of life, the pope said.

"With this vital presence, we are made participants in his divinity," transformed and reconciled in Christ, creating harmony throughout creation, he said.

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

"St. Paul tells us, yes, there is progress in history, there is — if you want — evolution in history," he said. "Progress is all that draws us close to Christ and, therefore, draws us closer to a united humanity."

Christians are called to contribute to progress by conforming themselves to Christ and by bringing others close to him, he said.

The pope encouraged the pilgrims to offer God everything that will happen in 2006, and he prayed that God would give them abundant blessings in the new year.

After the audience, the Vatican released the text of a telegram expressing Pope Benedict's condolences to the injured and to the families of those who died after the roof of an ice-skating rink in Germany collapsed Jan. 2.

In addition to offering prayers and condolences, the pope offered his blessing to the rescue workers.

New Year may lead to deeper 'sacramental union'

Although much may have happened in 2005, and there is a great deal more to look forward to in 2006, doesn't each year have a sameness to it?

—We rise in the morning, head for work, return home at night, only to rise the next day for the same routine.

—Most of our friends have a sameness — so much so that we can almost predict what they will say or do.

—There may be a new song here or there, but so much of the music we hear has been heard before.

—We go to the same church, hear the Gospels repeated and often listen to repeated homilies.

—We flip from one season to another, only to start each season over again.

My wish for you is that 2006 will be special when it comes to drumming out humdrum sameness. My prayer is that it will be blessed with awesome sacramental moments that generate life anew in you!

What do I mean by this?

In his book "The Glass Bead Game," Hermann Hesse writes about Joseph Knecht, an intelligent school boy visited by a music master to see if he is smart enough to enter a school for bright students.

As a test, the music master asks Joseph to play the school song with him. After finishing the song, the music

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

master asks, "Did you like that?"

"Yes," replies Joseph.

"Then let's play it again," and so they do. Repeatedly the music master inquires after each playing, "Did you like that?" and Joseph responds, "Yes."

As they continue to play, Joseph suddenly experiences the notes in new and animated ways. His small world of music suddenly has been transformed into a spellbinding higher order.

Later Joseph will recall, "It was a sacramental union." The song now rang with unimaginable new life and took on exciting vibrancy.

As Joseph experienced life anew, may the year 2006 be a time when you see life, your spouse, children, parents, friends and acquaintances in a new and touchingly unfamiliar way. May it lead to a deeper union with them that becomes an awesome sacramental union.

Christmas — the most wonderful time of the year?

True meaning of season lost amidst controversy

As I reflected on the Christmas season, which ends Jan. 8 with the Epiphany, I thought about how Christmas has become more commercialized, and this joyous holiday has become stressful for many of us.

There is a tree to decorate; gifts to purchase; a Christmas party to host; cards to mail and so on.

This year, Christians had one more thing to stress over — the “Christmas Controversy.”

When did it become an insult to wish someone “Merry Christmas”? Why must we feel obligated to use the inoffensive “Season’s Greetings” or “Happy Holidays”?

Why should we feel guilty about putting a beautiful, lighted tree in the public square?

According to the Central Intelligence Agency World Factbook, 76 percent of Americans identify themselves as Christian.

So is it outrageous to assume the person selling me tickets to “King Kong” celebrates Christmas?

If I lived in Israel, would I be offended if someone wished me “Happy Hanukkah”? If I was in Jordan at the end of Ramadan, would I turn away in disgust if someone greeted me with “Joyous Shawwal”? If a Buddhist friend invited me to his Nirvana Day party, would I decline because I’m not Buddhist?

Honestly, no. Even though I don’t celebrate those holidays, the purpose of the greetings and celebrations would not be to convert me, but simply to share the

As I Was Saying

KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

joy the celebrants feel during this special time of year.

One of my friends, who is Jewish, told me when she was growing up she would go Christmas caroling with her friends.

My mother has a Jewish friend who collects Santa Clauses.

Although these examples symbolize the more secular, commercial part of Christmas, they are connected inextricably to that sacred holiday. Evidently, not all non-Christians are offended by Christmas celebrations.

When I wish people “Merry Christmas,” I don’t expect them to fall on their knees and profess their love of and belief in Jesus Christ. I just want to share the joy I feel this time of year.

And if they do love and believe in God — the Father, Son and Holy Spirit — that’s something we have in common.

I tried a little experiment. In the last weeks before Christmas, I made a point to say “Merry Christmas” to people I encountered. I was astonished by how many cashiers, receptionists and wait staff thanked me, the surprise evident in their voices.

Now, I know that you shouldn’t wish anyone “Merry Christmas” until Christmas Eve, because until then it’s the penitential time of Advent, but apparently I haven’t been able to undo 27 years of Protestantism in the six years since I became Catholic.

And I as I wrote this column, I realized I still should have been saying “Merry Christmas” for the last week. I’m sure that would have gotten some surprised responses. Again, I blame my 27 years of Protestantism.

So this Sunday, when Christmas ends with the celebration of the Epiphany, I will reluctantly take down my beautiful white pine, put away the decorations and stop wishing everyone “Merry Christmas.” Until next December.

Merry Christmas and Happy New Year to all!

You can wish me a...
Merry Christmas!

Old and new: Two dimensions of life?

2006 will be how we choose to make it

The spiritual leaders of the Hebrew people dared to believe that life is completely surrounded by God.

“As the mountains surround Jerusalem, so the Lord surrounds his people both now and for evermore” (Ps. 125:2).

Not by accident, the previous psalm (124) states: “If the Lord had not been on our side — let Israel say — they would have swallowed us alive.”

The question is: “Is 2005 really old and 2006 really new?”

I don’t know the answer, but I do know that “unless the Lord builds the house, its builders labor in vain” (Ps. 127).

As we identify the old with the year 2005 and the new with the year 2006, we may fall short of the real meaning of life, because both dimensions are always present as we make our journey. Both the old and new are surrounded by God and we carry them with us everywhere.

The old and the new are not two dimensions of life, but only one entity facing the past or the future. We are called to learn from the past and to project into the future.

The real two dimensions of life are the vertical and horizontal dimensions: do we live immersed in planet earth embracing all the possibilities there are (horizontal), or do we raise our lives to higher values and undiscovered frontiers (vertical)?

For instance when a baby is born, there is nothing more mysterious in the world than that creature, a bundle of human possibilities. All human faculties are there. The blessing or the curse will be based upon which dimension the baby will develop for the rest of his or her life.

One great man of all generations was Albert Schweitzer. He was a great admirer of Bach; he was a biblical scholar and writer of philosophy in the Western World. Then he studied medicine, went down to equatorial Africa, built a hospital and took care of the people. What a great balance between the old and the new, the horizontal and the vertical.

During our lifetime we are not sailing nowhere; we are sailing somewhere. And the journey would be unbearable if we were sailing from boredom to who-knows-where. But if we are moving toward a place that we wish to go, we can somehow bear with better grace the trials in transit.

I don’t know how you feel on New Year’s Day. Some people enjoy the camaraderie and frivolity characteristic of the occasion; some feel depressed, because they have one year less in their life’s span.

As for me, I felt on this New Year’s Day exactly as I felt on Dec. 31, 2005.

So, my friends, 2005 and 2006 are not about the old and the new, but rather the horizontal or vertical. Life can be heaven or hell; it all depends on how we make it.

May your life on earth be heaven in 2006.

Capuchin Father John C. Aurilia is pastor of Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville.

History of the sanctuary lamp

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. Can you explain the sanctuary lamp, which is lit in churches next to the tabernacle? How did it start? What is its connection to the Eucharist? Does it need to be red? (Illinois)

A. The use of candles and lamps in temple rituals, processions and other religious events goes back to ancient pagan times. It was customary with the Jews, and the followers of Christ picked up the practice from the beginning of Christianity.

Apart from its practical necessity, light seems to have been a natural sign of purity, holiness and life, “conquering” darkness and its portents of gloom and death. Christian liturgies, especially the Liturgy of the Hours, speak often of the spiritual symbolism of light, especially of Christ as light, opposing the night of sin and evil.

The sanctuary lamp near the tabernacle containing the eucharistic presence of Christ came into use very late, for an obvious reason. During most of the history of the Christianity, until the 12th century in fact, churches contained no tabernacles, at least visibly.

The Blessed Sacrament was reserved privately, perhaps in another part of church or in the priest’s home, only for emergencies, particularly Communion for the sick and dying.

In the 11th century, in response to some controversial theories of a theologian, Berengarius of Tours, the church began a long development of eucharistic doctrine. This resulted in an increased awareness of the role of Christ’s human nature in salvation and thus in a new reverence for, and devotion to, our Lord in the Eucharist.

In time, visible tabernacles became common in Catholic churches to facilitate the expression of the faithful’s eucharistic beliefs.

One historian connects the sanctuary lamp to this devotion. It is understood as a sign of devotion, much as other devotional candles, and also as a sign that the Eucharist is present in the tabernacle.

The sanctuary light may be of any color.

MILWAUKEE — Imagine how many lives have been touched because a group of students was perched on a hillside near Milwaukee's Marquette University nearly 20 years ago drinking soda and beer, littering the area with their cans.

Ruth Hana spotted the 40 or so cans on her way back from the bank. Seeing the glittering aluminum tossed onto the grass ignited an idea for the Gesu parishioner who at the time worked for Milwaukee County.

The cans translated into dollars for Hana, who recognized that the aluminum could be recycled and the money given to charity.

The students' discarded cans were the first of 764,000 aluminum cans that Hana has collected over the past two decades, with more than $11,000 going to charity. In all, thanks to other money-raising ventures conceived by Hana, including a popcorn sale to co-workers, she has donated $55,774.55 to charities, including the American Diabetes Association, American Cancer Society, American Red Cross and about 15 other charities.

By far the bulk of Hana's contributions, $28,264, has gone to prevent child abuse and neglect, something she saw firsthand as she worked as a clerk for the county.

Splurging for others

The stories the county social workers shared with her pulled at her heartstrings. Likely, too, they reminded Hana of her own childhood at St. Rose Orphanage and with various foster families.

"Some treated me well, others treated me badly — very badly," she said, adding that one family padlocked the refrigerator at night so she couldn't take food, locked the bathroom door at 9 p.m. so she couldn't use the toilet and sent her to school with only a peanut butter sandwich.

At age 17, Hana weighed only 85 pounds.

After graduation from Messmer High School, she found work she loved at the Old City Bank and Trust. She has never married, and has lived alone in tiny, one-bedroom apartments in downtown Milwaukee.

She lives simply, never learned to drive and doesn't have elaborate furnishings in her home. Her one splurge came in 2003 when she traveled to Rome to see Milwaukee Archbishop Timothy M. Dolan receive the pallium, a circular band of white wool worn around the neck that symbolizes an archbishop's authority and unity with the pope.

When people ask her why she collects the cans for charity, rather than keeping the money for herself, her answer is, "If I collect them for myself, it's not fun anymore."

Cans galore

Part of the fun for Hana is the recordkeeping. She keeps meticulous, handwritten logs of every can she has collected and from whom. In fact, she knows that her former county co-worker Gary Porter, who drinks only Tab, has given her more than 27,000 cans.

Hana's cans come from co-workers, Marquette students and fellow apartment tenants, but nearly half (312,338) she has picked up herself, most from the former County Stadium and now Miller Park where the Milwaukee Brewers baseball team plays.

Weather permitting, Hana takes the bus to nearly every Brewer home game and collects around 350 cans. Her best game, she said, was the final one at County Stadium where she gathered 854 cans in four large bags.

She transports them back to her apartment where she rinses them out in the tub. She's gone through three electric can crushers and can no longer find them on the market, so she crushes them by hand and once a week, again by bus, takes the cans to Bandos Recycling and Shredding in Milwaukee.

There she receives about 60 cents a pound for the cans, slightly more than the going rate, because Felix and Marcus Bandos, the owners, know she collects for charity.

Ongoing mission

When Hana began working for the county in 1977, she discovered other sources of cans. Even though she retired in 1995, she still makes regular trips to see her co-workers who collect cans for her.

"I've learned we've got to help others," said Hana of her collecting, "and it's not that we help others because we expect something back in return."

A parishioner at Gesu for more than 50 years, Hana said she tells God, "I don't ask for anything in return, but I do ask you that I can stay healthy so I can continue to be able to do this."

Recently diagnosed with type 2 diabetes and with a slight form of epilepsy, Hana — who turns 76 Jan. 5 — is eyeing the 1 million mark for cans.

"The Lord always provides for me," she said, adding she thanks him daily for the ability to collect.

"If I go to the office once a week (to collect cans from former co-workers), it gets me away from the TV — and I love TV — and I get some exercise," she said. "That makes me happy and when I look at the charities and what I've done so far, I say, 'Wonderful — that's really all right.'"

WASHINGTON — When senators return to work in mid-January one waiting task will be to decide what to do with the big, unwieldy Christmas present left for them by the House, labeled "immigration reform."

It's improbable that the Senate would pass as-is the Border Protection, Anti-Terrorism and Illegal Immigration Control Act, which passed the House Dec. 16 by a vote of 239-182.

The question is whether the Senate will try to amend and rework the House bill more

GLOBE-TROTTER

Diesa Seidel, a physical education teacher and a former basketball star, has coached in an interreligious basketball league in South Korea, played professional women's basketball in France and Italy, built Habitat for Humanity homes in Guyana and helped spruce up a poor neighborhood in Trinidad and Tobago.

Catholic school teacher uses athletic ability to bridge cultures

MORRIS PLAINS, N.J. (CNS) — In many ways, Diesa Seidel, physical education teacher at St. Virgil School in Morris Plains and a former basketball star, is a real "globe-trotter." And she has years of frequent-flier miles to prove it.

The 25-year-old Seidel has coached in an interreligious basketball league in South Korea, played professional women's basketball in France and Italy, built Habitat for Humanity homes in Guyana and helped spruce up a poor neighborhood in Trinidad and Tobago.

In high school and college, the 6-foot-3 Seidel lit up the scoreboards with her considerable basketball talents. Today, she loves lighting up the faces of the students she teaches, encouraging them to eat right and exercise regularly.

On her international service trips, she loved trading smiles — and making friends — with the many warm and colorful people of various cultures and religions she met along the way.

"Diesa has the ability to work with people beyond all differences," said Carol Pobanz of the New York-based Religious Youth Service, which ran the service trips to Guyana and Trinidad and Tobago. "She is interested in all kinds of people. She invests her heart, not only in the work, but in the people."

Last fall, Seidel raised more than $4,000 for Religious Youth Service by collecting pledges before running the 26.2-mile New York City Marathon. She placed in the fastest one-third overall — 12,933 out of 37,300 runners — and in the fastest one-quarter among women.

"You don't know what you can do until you do it," she said. "I saw the clock at the end of the run, and thought 'Wow, I just ran a marathon!'"

Last summer, far across the Pacific, Seidel, who once played pro ball in France and Italy, scored points for peace, serving as games coordinator at the Interreligious Peace Sports Festival in Asan, South Korea. There, college-age young people from the world's various religions gained understanding of each other by coming together to play in a series of competitive sports tournaments.

"We learned about each other's religions and cultures by attending each other's services," said Seidel, who last year coached a Christian girls' basketball team at the festival.

"We all made friends and accepted each other," she said. "If we can all get along playing basketball, why can't the world get along?"

Alito's longer paper trail gives senators much material for questions

WASHINGTON (CNS) — As the second Supreme Court nominee in five months faced the Senate Judiciary Committee, Judge Samuel Alito Jr. encountered a hearing markedly more skeptical in tone than the one now-Chief Justice John Roberts sailed through in September.

Contributing to the difference were Alito's lengthier record of judicial opinions and a perception that Alito would be more judicially conservative than Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, whom he would replace if confirmed.

One key area on which committee members focused was Alito's writings on abortion, including his 1985 application to become deputy assistant attorney general, in which he said he personally strongly believed in the government's position that "the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion."

Alito responded to questions about specifics of prior Supreme Court rulings by saying that legal precedent holds great importance.

"There needs to be a special justification for overruling a prior precedent," he said.

In his opening remarks Jan. 9, Alito said that "good judges are always open to the possibility of changing their minds based on the next brief that they read or the next argument that's made by an attorney who's appearing before them, or a comment that is made by a colleague during a conference on the case."

Despite the efforts to scrutinize and criticize Alito's rulings and personal views, it seemed likely that the Senate ultimately would confirm him. He could be sworn in as soon as late January.

Alito, 55, would be the fifth Catholic on the current court, the first time Catholics would constitute a majority there. The other Catholics are Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas.

FROM THE VATICAN

Christians are called to draw others to faith, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — With their witness of love, a reflection of the light of Christ, Christians are called to draw others to faith, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The light of the star of Bethlehem, which led the Magi to the baby Jesus in the manger, is the light of God, who is love, the pope said Jan. 6 as he celebrated the feast of the Epiphany of the Lord with a Mass in St. Peter's Basilica.

"The light that dawned at Christmas and today is manifest to the peoples, is the love of God revealed in the person of the Incarnate Word," the pope said.

In celebrating Christ revealed to the world as the one who reconciles everyone to God, the papal celebration of the Epiphany is also the occasion for the formal announcement of the date Easter will be celebrated, the pope said.

Easter will be celebrated April 16 this year.

In his homily, Pope Benedict said, "God revealed himself in the humility of the human form, in the condition of a servant, in fact, in the crucified one."

God's hiding in such a humble form, he said, is "the most eloquent" revelation of who God really is.

The feast of the Epiphany also reveals the mystery of the church and its mission, he said.

"It is called to make the light of Christ shine in the world, being a reflection of his light just as the moon reflects the light of the sun," the pope said. "Taught by him to live in the style of the beatitudes," members of the church "must attract all men to God through the witness of their love."

More than 800 million children are exploited, says Vatican report

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — More than 800 million children around the world are victims of malnutrition, disease, trafficking and other forms of economic and social exploitation, an annual Vatican report said.

Among the more worrisome trends are the more than 200 million child laborers between 5 and 14 years of age and the increase in street children on several continents, it said.

Millions more children are forced into armed conflict or prostitution. In many countries, births are unregistered, leaving those children open to a lifetime of exploitation, it said.

"They are the scandal of our time. For 860 million children of the world, the future is an unknown, the present is a nightmare that lies on the consciences of adults," said the report, issued Jan. 5 by Fides, the Vatican missionary news agency.

The annual report seeks to draw attention to the plight of young people on the feast of the Epiphany of the Lord, which the church marks as the world missionary day for children.

The Holy Childhood Association, one of four pontifical mission societies, finances and supports thousands of projects aiding the neediest children in developing countries. In 2004, it allocated $18 million for nearly 1,800 projects, including programs at schools and orphanages.

The report said that among the estimated 211 million child laborers about 171 million work in hazardous environments — operating dangerous machinery, handling toxic materials or spending hours in poorly ventilated mines, for example.

Human trafficking involves more than a million children each year, it said. The phenomenon is growing, and Europe has become a central hub for the trade in children, it said. Most of the victims are between 8 and 16 years old, destined for forced labor, criminal activities or prostitution; some newborns are also sold for adoption.

The report cited projections that in a few years the number of children in Africa orphaned by the HIV/AIDS pandemic will reach 18 million. Every minute in Africa, it said, one child contracts HIV and one child dies of AIDS.

Pope John Paul II's would-be assassin to be freed from Turkish prison

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Turkish terrorist who shot and seriously wounded Pope John Paul II in a failed 1981 assassination attempt was scheduled to be freed on parole from a Turkish prison Jan. 12.

Since his extradition from Italy to Turkey in 2000, Mehmet Ali Agca served five years of a 10-year sentence for the 1979 murder of a Turkish journalist and two robberies the same year.

But a Turkish court said Agca had completed his prison term and could be released, according to the country's semiofficial Anatolia news agency.

Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said Jan. 8 that the decision to release Agca should be up to the Turkish courts.

Agca, 48, had served 19 years in an Italian prison for his May 13, 1981, assassination attempt on Pope John Paul in St. Peter's Square. Just days after the near-fatal shooting, the pope publicly forgave Agca, and in 1983 embraced his would-be assassin in his Rome prison cell.

Though he was sentenced to life in prison for the shooting, Italian authorities granted Agca clemency in 2000 and returned him to Turkey. At the time, the Vatican said the pope personally intervened in the gunman's release from the Italian prison.

After returning to Turkey, Agca was sent to prison for the murder of the editor of a liberal Turkish newspaper and two robberies committed in 1979.

New Turkish laws reduced Agca's original punishment from life in prison to a 10-year sentence. Additional penal code reforms led a Turkish court recently to further deduct the years Agca served in Italian prison, thereby completing his sentence.

Cardinal Renato Martino, president of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, said his council did not want to interfere with the Turkish court's decision that determined Agca had "paid his debt to justice."

Pope John Paul's former secretary, Polish Archbishop Stanislaw Dziwisz of Krakow, said the late pope "would have celebrated" upon hearing the news of Agca's scheduled release from prison.

"The Holy Father had forgiven him from the very first moment, sincerely so, and then when he met him in jail he spoke to him like a brother," he said Jan. 9.

Archbishop Dziwisz said the pope had once asked, "How could we show ourselves before the Lord if we didn't forgive each other?"

Greensboro Hibernians donate $6,000 to charities

Funds will assist local, overseas needy; hurricane victims

GREENSBORO — The Na Cara Division of the Ancient Order of Hibernians (AOH) in Greensboro the recently hosted a state board meeting in conjunction with the formal presentation of donations totaling $6,000 to national AOH charities for Northern Ireland and the United States, as well as local and diocesan charities.

The funds were raised through the raffling of an all-expenses-paid golf trip to Ireland for four people at $100 per ticket, with 120 tickets sold.

John J. Meehan, AOH national vice president, attended the meeting and ceremony Dec. 3, 2005 in Greensboro.

During the meeting, he was presented with checks for the Freedom for all Ireland Fund, $450; Holy Cross/Ardoyne Trust, $900; Project St. Patrick, $900 by Patrick Rooney, division president.

Checks were also presented to representatives of the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation, $900; Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools scholarships, $900; Room at the Inn, $750; St. Vincent de Paul Society, $250; and Diocese of Charlotte seminar assistance, $450.

The Division Charity Committee had established the allocations of all the above contributions at higher levels when they became aware of AOH members and their families in New Orleans who were in need of assistance due to Hurricane Katrina.

The committee immediately adjusted the allocations to provide $500 for two New Orleans divisions, and division officers authorized the checks to be sent immediately to the affected divisions' presidents.

This was before the national AOH disaster relief fund was established, because the officers felt the situation was critical and time was of the essence.

The $900 donation to Cystic Fibrosis Foundation was given in honor of the Tamborino family, whose several young children suffer from cystic fibrosis. The children's father, Frank Tamborino, is a former grand knight of the Knights of Columbus council, which also includes many AOH members.

Tamborino's wife, Norine, and their children were present and offered their sincere gratitude to the AOH for the donation for research to find a cure.

Each representative of the benefiting charities also spoke in gratitude to the AOH.

"The Na Cara Division members are proud and happy to have been able to provide help to so many people through these charities," said Michael Slane, state director of AOH.

A principal objective of the Na Cara Division in the distribution of the funds was to promote awareness of the AOH — who they are and what they represent — and their presence in the community and the Diocese of Charlotte as a force for good, as well to emphasize the growth and related charitable work being done by the AOH in the South with the brotherhood.

History of the Ancient Order of Hibernians

The Ancient Order of Hibernians is the oldest Catholic lay organization in America.

Formed in New York in 1836, it is the fusion of several organizations derived from a common source born in anger centuries earlier in Ireland.

Beginning in the sixth century, Ireland was subjected to a series of invasions by those who would master the Irish and alter their Gaelic life style. Inflexible opponents like the Vikings were fought until their power was broken; others, like the Normans, were absorbed until they became as Irish as the Irish themselves.

Through it all, the Irish maintained their heritage: language, traditions and religion. The 16th century however, brought their greatest challenge.

The divisions and Hibernian halls across the country have traditionally provided a welcome for new immigrants. Here, the unique art, dance, music and other interests of the Irish are fostered and preserved, making the AOH a home away from home for many.

Together, they are at the forefront of support for issues concerning the Irish such as emigration reform and the Right to Life.

New country, new life — new skills

Catholic Social Services offers language, job skills

CHARLOTTE — Thanks to Catholic Social Services and Central Piedmont Community College, 17 recent refugees to the Charlotte area now have the English-language and job skills needed to seek jobs in the hospitality industry.

An instructor from CPCC's Pathways to Employment program taught the free classes to the refugees using an apartment rented by CSS.

Pathways to Employment is funded by the state of North Carolina and through grants from organizations including the United Way of the Carolinas and the N.C. Community College System.

Pathways is a community-based initiative that CPCC, CSS, the Department of Social Services, community businesses and other organizations utilize to move participants from welfare to work.

In an effort to meet the needs of the community, CPCC developed a flexible, short-term program that provides academic, social and job-specific training designed to prepare students to enter the workforce as skilled employees.

The CSS-sponsored course focused on English as a Second Language and hospitality skills, such as how to set up and clean a hotel room, said Jennifer Girard, coordinator of the ESL for the diocesan CSS Refugee Resettlement office.

At the end of the seven-week program, the students received a certificate to mark their achievement. Representatives from CSS and CPCC were on-hand for a graduation ceremony Dec. 16.

The ceremony was the first such event for most of the refugees, many of whom have only a third- or fourth-grade education. They are Montagnards from Vietnam, where Christians are often persecuted; and Somali Bantu fleeing civil war and ethnic persecution in Somalia.

"The outcome the state looks for — employment for refugees — is one of CSS's goals as well," said Girard.

Girard hopes to expand the program to include other industries, without additional cost, by continuing to use CSS space and state-funded instructors employed by CPCC.

Two new groups of students began ESL classes Jan. 11.

"The demand for classes is increasing due to the arrival of more refugees, without additional funding," said Girard.

In December 2005, 85 Montagnard refugees arrived in Charlotte from Vietnam.

Bishop celebrates Mass to remember miners

McCloy Jr., the only survivor.

Philippi lost three of its residents in the incident, and Bishop Bransfield came to celebrate the Mass to help foster healing and to bring comfort to the community.

The bishop said the black ribbons that draped the front doors of St. Elizabeth Church "signify the sorrow of all of us for the miners who have perished, the one who remains ill and for their families who continue to suffer through these difficult days."

Concelebrating the Mass with the bishop were Father Andy Kranyc, pastor of St. Elizabeth, and Msgr. Mark Ward, pastor of St. Zita Church in Masontown.

During the Mass, Bishop Bransfield thanked Father Kranyc for being present to the families of the miners as they waited for news of their loved ones and for consoling them after they learned of their deaths.

"He was the best representation the church in West Virginia could have," the bishop said, receiving a round of applause from Father Kranyc's congregation in response.

For their families

During his homily, Bishop Bransfield said that not long after he became bishop of Wheeling-Charleston last February, his secretary, Father Paul Hudock, took him to Beckley to tour an area coal mine.

"In seeing this, I had to wonder how difficult it was for these men to work under such conditions," Bishop Bransfield said. "I'm sure that everyone asks, the world asks and our American community asks why people work in these tough places. The answer is their families."

"These men work so hard to achieve a living — a good living — so that they can be good to their children, grandchildren and extended family," he said.

This is the culture of West Virginia, where family is valued and is given priority, he added. He also talked about the work ethic of the people of the Mountain State in providing for their families.

"I'm sure that when these 13 men went in there, their work ethic was clear," Bishop Bransfield said. "They were going to work very hard for the people they loved and for the achievement of the best life for them."

"When our prayers go out to them, we recognize that their vocation, their drive, their willingness to do this under such difficult conditions were not for themselves," he added. "It was for the love of others, which Christ tells us is — with the love of God — the paramount reason that we live."

Those left behind

Concern should now be focused on support for the families of the miners and helping them through their grief, he said.

Through the celebration of the Mass, the church prays that the 12 miners will be cared for by a loving Christ, he added, noting that the greatest reward is resurrection, which God promises to everyone.

"As a faith-filled state with many, many Christians who do believe that these men have gone to the Lord, it is important that our prayers" continue, Bishop Bransfield said.

"It is our obligation as a community to pray for and support the families left behind, that they are not left behind in another sense of community, that our communities are strong, are vibrant and loving, and that will be shown to the world by the people of West Virginia," he said.

"These men worked hard for the people they loved, just as the Lord loves us. Their passage, we pray, will be one as triumphant as our lord and savior Jesus Christ," said Bishop Bransfield.

Following the Mass, Bishop Bransfield spoke with the people of the parish, who said they appreciated his presence during this difficult time.

"I would like to thank the bishop for coming. That meant a lot to me," said Steve Guire, a coal miner who is also a St. Elizabeth parishioner. "It just strengthened everyone to know that the bishop cares enough to come."

Bishop Bransfield celebrated the funeral Mass for miner Terry Helms Jan. 10 at St. Zita Church in Masontown, along with Father Ward and Msgr. Jerome McKenna, vicar general of the diocese who is a former pastor of the parish.

West Virginia priest kept vigil with miners' families in tragedy

SAGO, W.Va. (CNS) — When Father Andy Kranyc heard the news of the Jan. 2 explosion at the Sago Coal Mine in Upshur County, which trapped 13 coal miners 260 feet underground, he immediately left to be with the families.

As the son and grandson of Pennsylvania coal miners, Father Kranyc knew well the dangers of the coal mining industry and wanted to be present for the families as they waited to hear the fate of their loved ones.

Upon his arrival he learned that three of the miners were from his community of Philippi, roughly 25 miles from Sago, where he is pastor of St. Elizabeth Church.

Father Kranyc stayed with the families through the duration of the ordeal. He was with them late in the evening on Jan. 3 in the Sago Baptist Church when they were told that 12 of the 13 miners were alive.

Unbeknown to the families, Father Kranyc and ministers of other religious denominations inside the church, the news was wrong and the reality was that all but one of the miners were found dead. Only 27-year-old Randal McCloy was clinging to life.

Father Kranyc said it was difficult to watch the jubilation of the families dissolve into overwhelming despair and disbelief.

"It was just devastating when the bad news came," he said. "People just couldn't believe it. It was awful."

As the hours passed, Father Kranyc stayed with the families to guide them through this difficult time and to comfort them in their pain and grief. He said he and the other ministers helped them to remember that God was present through this tragedy.

"God could be found with the trapped miners and suffering with them and their families," Father Kranyc said.

The families held on to their faith before and after learning of the deaths of the miners, the priest said, adding that they prayed together asking that God's will be done and for the strength to accept whatever that may be.

SEEKING 'SHELTER'

Traditional Hispanic celebration re-enacted at St. Gabriel Church

BY ANA NARANJO LOTHSPREICH
SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — An old Hispanic tradition recently came alive in Charlotte.

More than 250 people attended "Las Posadas," a night of bilingual prayer, song and celebration at St. Gabriel Church Charlotte Dec. 20.

The event, celebrated since colonial times in towns across Latin America, is a re-enactment of the Holy Family's journey from Nazareth to Bethlehem.

In Latin America, particularly Mexico, the "Las Posadas" ("shelter") usually includes an outdoor procession from the church to a family's home, repeating the procession to a different house for nine consecutive days.

The "Las Posadas" presentation at St. Gabriel Church was combined with another Hispanic tradition, the Christmas novena, as a result of the Hispanic parishioners' desire to share their traditions with fellow Catholics during the Christmas season.

Twenty adults and children from the parish's Hispanic community played roles or participated in the program, prepared by the church's Hispanic ministry and their choir, Alegria Hispana.

A part of the celebration is the presence of the "santos peregrinos" ("holy pilgrims"), or Mary and Joseph. Two people, children or adults, dress for the role, or the pilgrims may be represented by statues that are carried in the procession.

On their way to their destination, the pilgrims look for a place to rest while those around them deny them shelter.

In Latin America, people usually gather to pray the Christmas novena starting on Dec. 16. The Christmas novena, like many popular Hispanic devotions, is geared around the rosary with various meditations and reflections.

Families organize the novenas at different homes each night and share in the anticipation and reverence of the season.

"We know that many people couldn't meet daily for the Christmas novena, so we wanted to share in one day the story from the Bible that tells us about all that happened, from the annunciation of St. Gabriel to Mary until the birth of Jesus," said Father Edward Sheridan, pastor of St. Gabriel Church.

"We are very pleased with this first-time celebration of 'Las Posadas' that has united our Hispanic community with the rest of the parish," he said. "The English-speaking guests who attended tonight are very enthusiastic to share in this tradition and are eager to attend again next year."

The rabbi spoke to the students about the Jewish religion and Hanukkah, the eight-day Jewish Feast of Lights, commemorating the rededication of the Temple by Judas Macabaeus in 165 A.D. On the eve of each successive day of the feast, one more candle on the nine-candle Hanukkah menorah is lighted, so that on the eve of the eighth day all nine — the kindling candle plus the eight used to mark the days — are lighted.

"(Rabbi Barras) was fantastic and the students loved listening to him," said Deborah Lee, school librarian.

Senate likely to swap for House immigration bill to its tastes, or just chuck it onto a back shelf and then rally behind a different bill with a better chance of passing in the upper body of Congress.

The 257-page House legislation focuses entirely on enforcement. It includes provisions to criminalize violations of immigration law, including the act of providing aid to illegal immigrants; would make it harder for legal immigrants to become citizens; and would penalize state and local governments that do not pointedly enforce immigration laws, currently only a responsibility of federal agencies.

It would eliminate a visa lottery program that allows up to 50,000 people a year from certain countries to enter the United States legally and would build 700 miles of new fence along the 2,000-mile border with Mexico.

The bill also would expand the employment authorization verification program, while not replacing the flawed database employers use for checking documents.

Not included in the bill were provisions encouraged by President George W. Bush to address U.S. demand for workers from other countries and to provide a way for the millions of people already in the country illegally to regularize their status.

Other options

Organizations that back a more comprehensive approach to immigration reform, including the Catholic Church, have thrown their support behind other bills, particularly one sponsored by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

That bill includes enforcement changes as well as a new worker visa program; improvements in legal immigration procedures so families can be reunited more quickly; and ways for immigrants already in the country illegally to pay a fine and adjust their status.

The Senate is expected to take up immigration legislation in February. Although the House bill passed by a large majority, few observers expect it to have much support in the Senate. Some predicted it wouldn't get past being assigned to a committee.

Still, as Washington got back to work after the holidays, opponents of H.R. 4437 were taking every opportunity to express their worries about its potential impact.

Catholic concerns

Washington Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick told reporters Jan. 5 that the U.S. bishops are "very concerned about this." One particular worry is that provisions to criminalize immigration violations would be applied to church workers who help needy people without regard for immigration status.

Under current law, being in the country illegally violates only civil law, not criminal codes. By making immigration violations a crime, those who even unknowingly assist people who are in the country illegally could be subject to prosecution.

"People who are trying to help immigrants will be finding themselves turned into criminals," Cardinal McCarrick said. "That's going to include people at churches."

For such church programs to screen out needy people based on their immigration status is not an option, he said, "if you want to do what the Lord told you to do."

In a statement, Don Kerwin, director of the Catholic Legal Immigration Network, known as CLINIC, warned that the bill would overturn two Supreme Court rulings that mandate fair treatment and due process for immigrants who are detained indefinitely by the Department of Homeland Security

'People who are trying to help immigrants will be finding themselves turned into criminals. That's going to include people at churches.'

because they cannot be deported to their home countries.

Those rulings led to a reversal of a previous policy of arbitrarily imprisoning people for years after they had served any criminal sentences when they could not be deported for a variety of reasons, such as a lack of diplomatic relations with the home country.

Kerwin said that under the House bill "we can expect, at minimum, an increase of thousands of indefinite detainees in U.S. detention facilities."

"This would be a huge step backwards," he added. "We should not expand a legal black hole that leaves migrants imprisoned in legal limbo."

Shared criticisms

During a telephone press conference held as the House debated the bill in mid-December, representatives from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Service Employees International Union, Americans for Tax Reform and the Manhattan Institute joined Bishop Thomas G. Wenski of Orlando, Fla., in criticizing the bill as inadequate and punitive.

Though the interest groups seemed to have common ground only in finding the House bill somehow inadequate, a criticism many shared was its failure to recognize that enforcement alone won't end illegal immigration.

Tamar Jacoby, of the Manhattan Institute, said the House bill takes an ostrichlike approach. Focusing only on enforcement fails to address the economic demand for foreign workers and will drive illegal immigrants further into the shadows of society, she said.

Bishop Wenski said among the House bill's failings is that it ignores the need to help legal immigrants reunite their families. The wait for family reunification visas is as long as 10 years, he pointed out, which adds to the pressure on people to enter the United States illegally.

Frank Sharry, director of the National Immigration Forum, which organized the press conference, said the bill also was supported because the House Republican leadership warned members they might be portrayed as opposed to border enforcement if they voted no.

"We're convinced there is bipartisan majority support for a centrist approach," Sharry said, adding that Senate Judiciary Committee leaders have indicated their interest in a more comprehensive bill.

Survey says majority of Hispanics call themselves pro-life

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A survey of Hispanics reported that 57 percent identify themselves as pro-life and support laws requiring parental notification before a daughter under 18 years old can get an abortion.

The survey said only 27 percent identified themselves as pro-choice and 36 percent opposed parental notification before a minor's abortion.

The survey by the Washington-based Latino Coalition, an independent organization specializing in issues affecting Hispanics, was released in Washington Jan. 5.

It reported the responses of 1,000 adult Hispanics surveyed Dec. 10-13 on public policy issues and had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1 percent.

Seventy percent of the respondents identified themselves as Catholics.

Regarding gay marriage, 62 percent said they opposed it.

On immigration issues, the survey reported that 86 percent favored a temporary worker program that would allow illegal immigrants to legalize their status and permit future immigrants to legally enter the U.S.

Almost 56 percent opposed any new laws that would require employers to hire only workers legally in the country and 53 percent opposed increasing the number of Border Patrol agents along the U.S.-Mexican border.

Robert Deposada, Latino Coalition president, said a breakdown of the results, however, shows a marked difference on specific immigration issues between Hispanic voters who have been in the United States for a long time and recent immigrants who cannot vote.

Voters are better off economically "and tend to be more focused on issues that affect their pocketbooks like taxes, education and health care," Deposada said in a news release about the survey.

"The more recent immigrants tend to have lower incomes, speak mostly Spanish only and are more concerned over immigration policies and language barriers," he said.

Regarding immigration, voters favor stricter border control measures and stiffer penalties against illegal immigrants, he said.

But 82 percent of voters also favor a temporary worker program, said Deposada.

The survey showed that 50 percent of the voters favor increasing Border Patrol agents along the southern U.S. border while 65 percent of the nonvoters opposed increasing the number of agents.

Regarding hiring, 50 percent of voters favor new laws requiring employers to hire only people legally in the country, while 65 percent of the nonvoters oppose such laws.

High school seniors feel abortion is wrong, favor curbs, shows survey sponses to more detailed questions on circumstances in which it should be allowed showed "most seniors regard abortion as morally wrong" and that they "would significantly limit" when a woman could have an abortion.

On abortion issues, the views of seniors who identified themselves as Catholics paralleled the general results, although there was a higher adherence to church teachings among Catholics who said that they went to church more than four times a month.

The survey of 1,000 public and private school seniors was conducted by Hamilton College in Clinton, N.Y., and the polling firm of Zogby International. It was made public at a Jan. 5 news conference in Washington.

The margin of error for the entire survey is plus or minus 3 percent and the margin of error for the 255 Catholic respondents is 6.4 percent.

"The issue of abortion has become so divisive within our country, but we can be thankful that the Catholic Church gives a clear message that life is sacred from conception until natural death," said Maggi Nadol, director of the diocesan Respect Life Office.

"Giving a clear message based on God as the Author of Life, is the teaching we want to hand down to our youth; the message we pray they live and embrace," she said.

The survey showed that seniors are "remarkably conservative on issues surrounding abortion," said an analysis of the poll written by Dennis Gilbert, Hamilton sociology professor and head of the survey team.

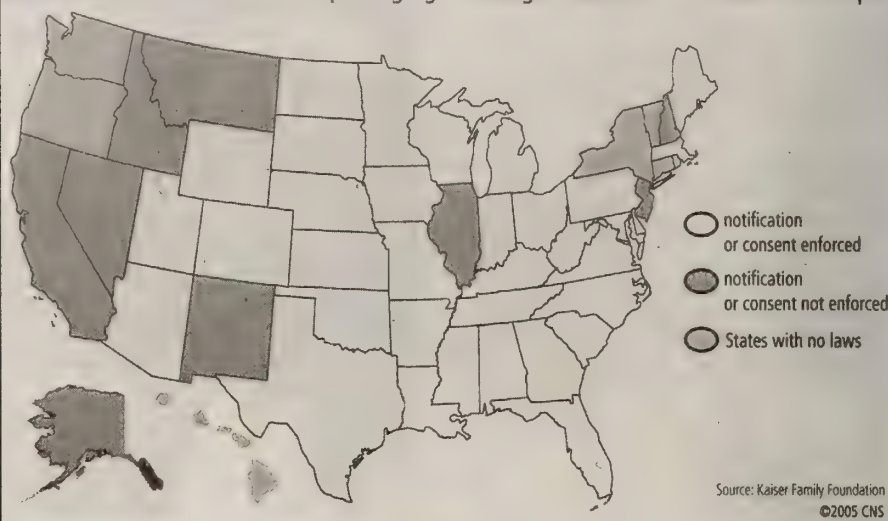

"Religion and reported church attendance are powerful influences on abortion ... opinions," said Gilbert. "Born-again Christians and those who attend services four or more times a month are notably more conservative on (this issue)."

The overall survey reported that 62 percent of the seniors supported the 1973 Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion, but it also showed there was widespread support for limiting access to abortion.

Almost half of the seniors opposed a right to abortion for girls who are under 18 and are unmarried and in cases where the baby would probably be born with birth defects. Seventy-two percent opposed abortion in the case of a married woman who does not want another child and 60 percent opposed abortion in the case of a woman who is from a poor family that cannot afford more children.

Two-thirds of the respondents would require parental consent before a girl under 18 could have an abortion.

The only strong support for abortion was in cases where the pregnancy was a serious threat to the mother's health (89 percent) and in cases of rape (81 percent).

When asked if they would consider an abortion, 70 percent of the female students said "no." Sixty-seven percent of the male seniors said "no" when asked if they would want their girlfriend to have an abortion.

Regarding the morality of abortion, 23 percent said it was always wrong and 44 percent said it was usually wrong. Only 4 percent said it was always acceptable and 28 percent said it was usually acceptable.

Regarding Catholics' answers on abortion, 38 percent of the less frequent churchgoers considered themselves pro-life while 60 percent of the more frequent churchgoers called themselves pro-life.

Among the more frequent churchgoers, 25 percent said abortion should always be illegal and 33 percent said it should be illegal most of the time. For those who go to church less than four times a month, 10 percent said it should be illegal all of the time and 32 percent said it should be illegal most of the time.

'Endowments are opportunities ... to provide for the future of the parish.'

St. Pius X Church reaches $1 million in endowments seems parishioners from decades ago had the foresight to leave a legacy and an endowment so even though they might be gone, the mission of their church would continue."

"Five years ago, the endowment for our parish totaled $50,000," said Msgr. Marcaccio. "Thanks to the incredible generosity of our parishioners, our endowments now total more than $1 million."

The foundation provides endowments for the Diocese of Charlotte and its parishes, agencies and organizations. An endowment is a permanent fund in which the principal is never touched.

The income may be used in accordance with the wishes of the donor organization or individual. Once an endowment is established, anyone may contribute to the fund.

Any diocesan entity may establish an endowment with $2,500 seed money. An individual or family may establish a named endowment with $25,000.

St. Pius X Church currently has three educational and four parish endowments established with the foundation — three set up by the parish, two by individual families and two through designations in a parishioner's estate plans.

St. Pius X Church's endowments provide a variety of financial support, including tuition assistance for Catholic school students and assistance for the general, pastoral, spiritual and educational needs of the parish.

The parish's endowments grew in five ways, according to Jim Kelley, executive director, of the foundation: two estate gifts from Roger Kavanagh, fundraising events, one-time gifts, Msgr. Marcaccio requesting contributions and the return on investments of the endowment principle.

"One concern pastoral leaders have is that focusing on endowments or planned giving will negatively impact the weekly offertory," said Kelley. "In fact, estate gifts don't come from income, but from assets."

St. Pius X Church endowed the parish at the same time it paid off the new athletic facility; purchased and paid off a new rectory; made improvements to the church properties; and retired the debt of the parish center and middle school expansion. During that time, the parish also increased its offertory, as well as the number and scope of parish ministries.

"Some pastors and finance councils are of the mind that you might want to wait to begin an endowment," said Msgr. Marcaccio. "I think that's a huge mistake. Endowments are opportunities for individuals to provide for the future of the parish or institution they cherish. People want to ensure that the things they love will continue to touch the lives of future generations."

Through the creation of endowments, the foundation provides a means to generate future and sustainable income for Catholic entities throughout the diocese.

"While we continue to increase our strong situation through the stewardship of all that is entrusted to us, there is much, much more to be done," said Msgr. Marcaccio. "We wish to continue our outreach to our community in Greensboro and to provide our school with more financial assistance for tuition."

"Together we have set an endowment goal of $800,000 solely for tuition assistance, so that more children might benefit from a faith-filled education," he said.

Currently, 46 parishes, 13 schools and 12 diocesan agencies have at least one endowment set up through the foundation.

"We've found that the entities that encourage donating to their endowment receive the most contributions," said

St. Pius X Church in Greensboro recently became the first parish in the diocese to reach the $1 million mark in endowments.

Kelley. "It is our hope that, over time, each parish, school and agency in the Diocese of Charlotte will have at least one endowment established for its long-term financial security."

Faithbooking

Those who make faith scrapbooks say the albums record God's presence

BY JENNIFER BURKE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROCHESTER, N.Y. — With an estimated 25 million enthusiasts, "scrapbooking" is a hot hobby right now, according to the Craft and Hobby Association.

But another approach to preserving memories also has quietly gained popularity. "Faithbooking," as it is often called, is not only about preserving memories and photographs but is also about leaving a record of the ways God has worked in a person's life, said Kimberli Brackett.

Brackett is a member of Faithbuilders, a ministry of Christian women who teach nondenominational retreats and seminars about women's spirituality. She also works as a consultant for a scrapbooking company.

Scrapbookers preserve memories by using photographs, stickers and a variety of other tools. Scrapbooking has turned into a $2.5 billion dollar industry with about 4,000 independent stores selling scrapbooking supplies in the United States, according to the association.

"I think that people really want to preserve their memories so future generations know about them and their lives. It's kind of like getting back to basics," said Terri Martone, co-owner of Scrapbook Creations in Fairport.

On the surface, scrapbooking and faithbooking seem similar. Each involves putting photographs into an album and writing a few thoughts about the memories represented in the albums, but the similarities end there, Brackett said.

The purpose of a faith album is to glorify God, so journal entries should explain how God's presence and work can be seen in the accompanying photographs, Brackett said.

Instead of simply recording the basic information about what is happening in a photograph, faithbookers try to look at it through God's eyes and show future generations what an individual's journey with the Lord has looked like, she added.

Emphasis in a faith album is placed on the spiritual aspect of the pages instead of the decorative aspect, said Sandra Joseph, president of Reminders of Faith, a publishing company specializing in the Christian scrapbook market.

Scrapbookers are often concerned about using the latest techniques and creating complex layouts for their scrapbook pages. Ten years from now those pages might be out of style, but the memories written upon the pages of a faith album will always have value, she said.

In a scrapbook Joseph's grandmother made many years ago, she wrote about the emotional struggles her husband endured when the family was quarantined with polio. Joseph's grandfather thought he had done something wrong to cause his family's illness, and he struggled with his faith, Joseph said.

Reading this story helped Joseph gain a deeper understanding of her grandfather, which she would not have gotten by simply looking at his photograph.

"He was a man who was faithful to God. He struggled through it, persevered through it, and that makes him so real," Joseph said.

"That's what's important to know; that's what helps us hang onto our faith," she said. "Yes, we've had to struggle, but yes, God was faithful, and the same God will be faithful to you."

The Bible could be considered a scrapbook or faith album because it is a record of the early Christians' struggles and lives, she added.

Both Joseph and Brackett believe Christians are called through the Bible to leave a record of God's hand in their lives for future generations. In the fourth chapter of the Book of Joshua, God told the Israelites to leave 12 stones by the bank of the Jordan river to remind their ancestors of the way he had helped them cross the river.

Faith albums can be the "stones" people today leave for the next generation, Joseph said.

The 78th Psalm reminds God's people to tell future generations about his power and praiseworthy deeds.

"We have taken that as verbally and forgotten that the most permanent way we can do that is to write things down. It's this real easy way to show what God has done in our lives," Brackett said.

Any photograph can be used in a faith album, Joseph said. A faith album can also include prayers, inspirational quotes and journal entries about the spiritual markers in one's own life, Brackett said.

When Jesus calls, we must sacrifice

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In the beginning of this weekend's Gospel we find Simon and Andrew tossing out their nets in the hope of catching some fish. When Jesus calls to them, saying in effect "leave your work, your boat and your father and follow me because I need you to be reaching for something more than fish," they do it.

Simon's and Andrew's response has dual parts:

- 1) They leave their nets.
- 2) They follow Jesus.

The first part requires sacrifice, the second, trust.

During the last many months I've been watching one of our adult children struggle with searching for a job. She claims she has no direction because she doesn't have a particular "passion" as her siblings do.

Most of her family and close friends easily recognize what she is passionate about: counseling at-risk children and young teens, and helping them develop social skills to change their life paths.

Friends, family and a few professionals also recognize that she is gifted with the natural abilities that assure her work in this field would make a difference in many lives if she follows the call of her passion.

The problem is she won't, figuratively, leave her nets. Additional education — grad school — is required, and she doesn't want to make the sacrifice of time, money or effort in the classroom. My guess is that she doesn't recognize the call or doesn't trust its truth enough to risk the sacrifice.

We aren't surprised that Simon and Andrew leave and follow because we know where they are going and that great things will happen to them — and to those to whom they will minister. But it's harder to make that decision to step out in trust from the front end.

This passage suggests that we must not only watch and listen for Jesus' call, but we also must be prepared for the sacrifice it will require. The example of Simon and Andrew reminds us that to follow Jesus, with all the attendant peaks and valleys along the journey, eventually will bring the great things of God.

Questions:

What "passion" or tugging at your heart might currently be the calling of God? What keeps you from responding or what sacrifice might be required to follow?

A 'Last Holiday' worth taking

LL Cool J, left, Gerard Depardieu and Queen Latifah star in "Last Holiday," a touching tale of dowdy spinster Georgia Byrd (Latifah), who, upon learning she has only a few weeks to live, takes her life savings and goes to Europe where she gets a makeover and learns to live life more fully, changing the lives of a corrupt businessman and less-than-altruistic politicians.

Wayne Wang's remake of a 1950 Alec Guinness movie is marred by some silly slapstick, but mostly it's a feel-good film with the marvelously empathetic Latifah and a positive message about recognizing life's possibilities and having the courage to follow through on them.

Latifah's transformation from drab mouse to glamourpuss is fun to watch, and throughout it all Georgia never loses sight of the basics or her strong moral center.

She chastises a senator, for instance, about not making his promised visit to her church back home. She reminds a businessman that he doesn't have to be ruthless. She gives a businesswoman a strong talking to about the futility and wrongness of her adulterous affair.

Latifah has the kind of charisma that appeals to the masses, and the film is helped by a good supporting cast.

A few instances of crude language, some frank sexual talk and innuendo, and an adulterous situation in an otherwise admirably wholesome film.

The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Catholic historians' group honors books by two priest-authors

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

PHILADELPHIA — The American Catholic Historical Association honored two priest-authors Jan. 7 during its annual meeting in Philadelphia.

Jesuit Father Stephen Schloesser received the association's John Gilmary Shea Prize for his book, "Jazz Age Catholicism: Mystic Modernism in Post-war Paris, 1919-1939," published in 2005.

Dominican Father Augustine Thompson received the Howard R. Marraro Prize for "Cities of God: The Religion of the Italian Communes, 1125-1325," published in 2005.

Each award carries a $750 prize.

Father Schloesser holds the chair in Catholic social thought in the Joan and Ralph Lane Center for Catholic Studies and Social Thought at the University of San Francisco and is an associate professor of history at Boston College in Chestnut Hill, Mass.

Father Thompson is an associate professor of religious studies and history at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville.

The Shea prize, named for a 19th-century historian of American Catholicism, is given each year to an American or Canadian author whose book is judged to have made the most original and significant contribution to the historiography of the Catholic Church during the 12-month period ending June 30.

The Marraro prize is named for a Columbia University professor who died in 1972 and goes annually to the author of a distinguished scholarly work dealing with Italian history or Italo-American history or relations.

Catholic Communication Campaign announces art contest

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The Catholic Communication Campaign of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops is asking students in first through sixth grades to illustrate through art "how Jesus would tell the good news today."

The deadline for submissions to the art contest is March 1. Entry information is available online at: www.catholiccommunicationcampaign.org.

Ramon Rodriguez, director of development for the campaign, noted that the campaign's theme is: "How the good news gets around."

"We all know that Jesus was a great storyteller," he said in a news release announcing the contest.

"He told many stories about the good news, God's love for each of us," he said. "We are inviting students to draw a picture of how Jesus would tell the good news today."

First-, second- and third-place winners will be selected on the basis of originality and creativity and will receive cash prizes.

Winners will be announced May 1 and the winning artwork will be featured on the campaign's Web site during May.

The Catholic Communication Campaign develops media programming, public service announcements and other resources to promote Gospel values. It is funded through a national collection, to be held in most parishes in 2006 the weekend of May 20-21.

Birthday cheers

Sister Warren entered the religious life with the Sisters of Mercy in 1951. After six months of postulancy, she taught at St. Benedict School in Belmont and realized that she had a love of teaching. During her time as a novice, she spent a canonical year studying the vows and working in the motherhouse. Four years later, she made her final vows.

During her nearly 50 years as a woman religious, Sister Warren has worked as a principal and teacher at St. Gabriel School, St. Joan of Arc School and St. Agnes School in Long Island, N.Y. She also was dean of students at Sacred Heart College in Belmont; a cytology technician, director of continuing education and pastoral minister at Mercy Hospital; and the pastoral associate at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte.

"Many spiritual opportunities have been available to me, and I've been able to participate in things that I would not have had if I hadn't been a part of my community," she said in 2002. "I am grateful to the Sisters of Mercy for all of the opportunities that I have been able to have, and I have enjoyed my life."

Granting help

Sisters of Mercy award more than $1 million in grants

CHARLOTTE — Sisters of Mercy of North Carolina Foundation announces grant awards totaling $1,495,318 to 27 nonprofit organizations located in several North Carolina counties.

The grant funds will be used for a wide variety of purposes by the organizations. Supported programs include affordable housing, children's services, crisis and employment assistance, education, food distribution, health care, literacy skills and social services.

Organizations benefiting from the foundation's grant-making activities include Asheville-Buncombe Education Coalition in Asheville, Boys and Girls Club of Transylvania County in Brevard, Crisis Assistance Ministry in Charlotte and St. Peter's Homes, Inc. in Charlotte.

St. Peter's Homes provides affordable housing and alleviates homelessness by operating McCreesh Place, a single room occupancy apartment community with onsite supportive services for formerly homeless, disabled men.

Since October 1996, the foundation has awarded 610 grants totaling more than $28 million to organizations assisting unserved or underserved populations.

'Child to Child'

Catholic students help collect $1 million to assist hurricane victims

CHARLOTTE — Children in Catholic schools and religious education programs in the Diocese of Charlotte united with students around the nation to raise more than $1 million to assist their fellow students affected by the recent Gulf hurricanes.

Through "Child to Child: A Catholic Campaign to Aid Education," local Catholic school students joined the National Catholic Educational Association initiative to collect monetary contributions to help children in areas ravaged by the storms and in other areas impacted by large numbers of evacuee students.

By Dec. 2, 2005, contributions totaled $1.04 million from 1,254 schools and religious education programs.

Linda Cherry, superintendent of Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charlotte, praised the exceptional charity and initiative of the students.

"The young people in the diocese captured the spirit of the 'Child to Child' campaign," said Cherry. "Through their personal gifts and fundraising efforts, they reached out to their counterparts in areas devastated by the hurricane."

"Their contributions went beyond money; they showed solidarity and support when most needed," she said.

Students put the concepts of social justice into practice in a tremendous way, noted Karen Ristau, NCEA president.

"This truly was a positive example of one student helping another," she said.

According to Cherry, many schools and parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte also reported making substantial contributions directly to local charities or to national organizations, such as Catholic Charities and the American Red Cross.

Other schools and religious education programs adopted parishes impacted by the hurricanes, providing monies and supplies.

Ristau said campaign monies have been distributed to the following archdioceses: Alexandria, Baton Rouge, Biloxi, Galveston-Houston, Houma-Thibodaux, Jackson, Little Rock, Memphis, Mobile, Nashville, New Orleans, San Antonio and Shreveport.

"We are supporting those areas most affected by the storms," said Ristau.

Many dioceses incurred significant financial challenges by enrolling students displaced from the hurricane areas. The Diocese of Charlotte initially enrolled more than 40 displaced students, a number of whom still remain in diocesan schools.

Ristau said all monies collected from students would go for the educational needs of students. NCEA is contributing the necessary administrative services to implement the program.

"While $1 million can't begin to cover the losses incurred by our educational organizations, it can help a recovering school replace destroyed computers or textbooks, or help a host school provide uniforms, books and tuition for displaced students," said Ristau.

Ristau and Daniel Curtin, executive director of NCEA's department of chief administrators, were in New Orleans Dec. 8 to present the $1.04 million that had been collected to Archbishop Alfred C. Hughes of New Orleans. They also delivered to area students letters of support from Catholic students around the country.

She and Curtin stayed in the Gulf Coast region for two days, visiting Catholic schools in New Orleans and Mississippi and talking to students and faculty members.

Cherry said the most compelling gift was the Christian charity that motivated young people to give to the "Child to Child" campaign and other humanitarian endeavors.

"As Catholic educators, we strive to teach our students to reach out to those in need," said Cherry. "The response to this catastrophe underscored that our students have gotten the message."

NCEA is the largest private professional education association in the world. The association's membership includes more than 200,000 educators serving 7.6 million students at all levels from pre-kindergarten through graduate school. It was founded in 1904.

The lesson of the Magi

A few weeks ago, as Christmas was approaching, Pope Benedict XVI offered excellent spiritual counsel that caused controversy in our secular media.

Anytime it seems the pope speaks with authority on matters of morality, especially if it involves money, sexuality, the family or political and social justice, it causes controversy in the media. The secular world thinks the Catholic Church is allowed to speak only on matters of faith or spirituality; that our faith has no place in social life and politics; that Christ or his church has no place telling us what to do in our homes, bedrooms or with our money.

But often we don't agree with the secular world. The Christmas mystery proclaims that God entered the human family as a baby precisely to invade our lives, to conquer and overcome the reign of sin in every aspect of our lives. God loves and cares for us so much that he desired to enter the human family and transform it from the inside out.

Therefore, our Catholic faith is to inform our decisions each day, because our decisions have eternal consequences.

As Catholics, we know the pope's voice is not one voice among millions; the pope does not just offer an opinion, but the definitive voice of Jesus Christ, who continues to lead and guide us on Earth. Jesus speaks through his church so that we are led away from the dangers of sin and remain on the path to eternal life.

That is why the media criticized the pope a few weeks ago when he encouraged us to overcome the "commercial contamination of Christmas" by rediscovering the child Jesus. The pope warned us to be careful about the dangers of consumerism, of keeping our focus on the material gifts and becoming attached to them.

Pope Benedict encouraged us to set up the Christmas nativity in our homes. He said, "The manger can be a simple but effective way of presenting the faith and transmitting it to one's children. The manger helps us to contemplate the mystery of God's love who revealed himself in the poverty and simplicity of the Bethlehem cave."

The pope is not condemning gifts, especially since on the feast of the Epiphany, we find even our Lord receiving gifts. We celebrate the arrival of the Magi, the kings from the east. They followed the light of the star to discover the true Light of the World, Jesus Christ.

The Gospel's light is to penetrate the darkness of our world and enlighten the hearts and minds of all men, Jews and Gentiles, believers and unbelievers.

And at their arrival, the Magi present gifts before the Lord that reveal that Jesus is indeed King and Lord. But more important than these gifts, the Magi offer a fourth gift that is offered before these material gifts: they offer themselves.

We are told that when they arrived, "they prostrated themselves and did him homage." They worshipped the Lord. They offered the gift of themselves in humble adoration to the Lord before their gifts.

Pope Benedict warned us of the temptation to focus on the material gifts at Christmas. We are tempted by the world to spend much time and money at shopping malls and stores before Christmas. And in the rush that precedes Christmas, we can be tempted to lose our focus on Jesus.

But we have a practical solution, a suggestion based upon the lesson of the Magi.

When Christmas approaches, don't buy any gifts. Don't waste time and money in shopping malls and stores. And while everyone else is wasting their time and money before Christmas, we are keeping our focus on preparing for the birth of Christ, the true and only meaning of Christmas.

If you want your children or your spouse to open gifts on Christmas morning, perhaps they could open a letter from you describing how much you love and appreciate them, how thankful you are for them. Make a gift of yourself to your children, family and friends, as the Magi offered themselves first to Christ.

Then, after Christmas, when everything is on sale and the shopping malls are quiet, spend the time and money to buy gifts for your family and friends. Present these gifts on the feast of the Epiphany, the day when Jesus received his gifts. This suggestion exemplified by the Magi will help to keep our focus on Christ and combat the threat of commercialism at Christmas time.

You will save time, money, headaches and ultimately enjoy Christmas more because you are keeping your focus on the birth of Jesus Christ and the true meaning of Christmas.

We might not change our secular culture of consumerism, but we can prevent it from contaminating our Christmas. One heart at a time, one family at a time, the Christmas mystery will have a profound change in our world.

Beginning now, this new year, let us follow the example of the Magi by making a gift of ourselves, a gift of love. As the Magi followed the light of a star to discover Christ, the Light of the World, follow their example.

They will lead you to true worship by making a gift of yourself to the Lord and your family. Then, we will discover that Christmas will indeed be a time of peace and joy.

Father Buettner is parochial vicar of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

Most important thing to know is God and his saving grace, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In a world marked by enormous discoveries and intellectual achievements, people must not overlook that the most important thing to know is God and his saving grace, said Pope Benedict XVI.

There are so many things to know and learn in today's information age, but all that knowledge can become "problematic, indeed dangerous, if the fundamental knowledge that gives us meaning and direction" — an awareness of God — is missing, the pope said in his Jan. 11 general audience.

What makes humans different from beasts and other animals is that they are able to recognize the truth and know that awareness of God will become "a relationship and friendship," said the pope.

"It is important in this age that we do not forget God" among all the many things there are to know and discover, he said.

The pope commented on Psalm 144 in which the psalmist makes note of the fragility of the body.

The psalmist asks God what makes him notice and "take thought of" mortal people who are just "like a breath, like a fleeting shadow, feeble and inconsistent, lost in the flow of time that passes by," said the pope.

God descended from heaven with the incarnation of Jesus, he said, and just like the shepherd who carried his lost sheep on his shoulders, Jesus carried on his shoulders the human condition, "our flesh, ourselves."

By becoming man, God became a reality that people could understand and establish "friendship, communion" with, said the pope.

While the psalm is about humanity's weaknesses and distance from "divine splendor," in the end it celebrates a surprising discovery that "next to us is God-Emmanuel, who for the Christian has the loving face of Jesus Christ," the pope said.

Ordinary is extraordinary

The Catholic Church brings us back to Ordinary Time after the joyous waiting of Advent and the shining stars of Christmas. We may feel like the party is over — and now what?

St. Andrew Missal has an answer: "What happens in our churches every Sunday is the fruit of our week. What happens as the fruit of the week past is the beginning of the week to come. Sunday, like all sacraments, is simultaneously a point of arrival and departure for Christians on their way to the fullness of the kingdom. This is not ordinary at all. This is the fabric of Christian living" (quoted by Paulist Press Ordo 2006, p.30).

After Christmas, can we go back with indifference to our work, not changed at all? Or has Christmas possibly burned a new fire and hope into our bones and somehow life can't be the same?

Is there any possibility for you and me to carry Christmas into life? Believe it or not, that is the only possibility.

Mary and Joseph had to do it. After the shepherds, Wise Men, angels and star were gone, Mary and Joseph were left alone with their new child and the tremendous responsibility to take care of him and to help him grow.

They had the responsibility to carry Christmas into life. How do we do that? We must carry Christmas into our homes.

I am sure Jesus was like any other baby — he got the flu and colds, he cried and kept his parents awake. They took him to synagogue, they read him the Scriptures.

Christmas for Jesus, Mary and Joseph was not an event, it was a way of life. We often talk about Christmas as an event of the past. We remember the good times when we were with one another; meanwhile we unconsciously relegate our Christmas to be an object in the attic to be used next year.

We all know that the greatest theological school is the home; the best church ever built is our home. Sometimes we have a house, but we don't have a home. The Holy Family had a home, but not a house.

Another way of living the ordinary is extraordinary is to carry Christmas in our workplace. Joseph's tools were instruments of work and worship. The clothes to wash and meals to cook were, for Mary, opportunities to serve and to grow.

They both were making these ordinary chores an extraordinary service to God and their daily world better. Every day we make differences. Nothing is ordinary if the work is done with love.

Finally we must carry Christmas in our faith, especially when it is tested. Mary and Joseph knew that moments in their lives would not always be shining stars and glimmering lights.

The Christmas season is over, but our lives are not. The decorations and trees are gone, but the music will always be in our hearts, because in the song of life, we write the words, God writes the music.

The message of 'Evangelium Vitae'

In 2005 we celebrated the 10th anniversary of "Evangelium Vitae" ("The Gospel of Life"), the encyclical written by Pope John Paul II.

"Evangelium Vitae" offers humanity a vision of a just society where every human life's intrinsic value is accepted, respected and protected. It presents the foundational teaching of the social doctrine of the Catholic Church — that God made each one of us in his image, endowed each one of us with immortal souls and calls each one of us to build in this world a society founded on love and respect for human life.

"Evangelium Vitae" addresses the widespread evil of abortion and its pervasive cancer-like effect on the body of humanity, which leads to a disrespect and violation of human life in all stages of its development. There can be no peace, there can be no justice, if this most fundamental gift of God, "the gift of life," is not accepted, protected and respected.

"Evangelium Vitae" stresses that the inherent value of human life is not just a theological belief. It is also based on natural law principles — principles that are accessible to all humanity regardless of faith allegiance (see No. 1 below).

"Evangelium Vitae" sees abortion not only as an evil action resulting from a personal choice to do harm to another, but also as an evil that has social implications to be addressed in a social forum. The encyclical calls for the legal protection of human life, but also calls for social initiatives that promote family, child-rearing and economic systems that affirm life (see No. 2 below).

During a November 2005 meeting of world religious leaders in Vatican City, Pope Benedict XVI spoke of a "healthy society" as one that "always promotes respect for the inviolable and inalienable rights of all people." The foremost right, upon which rests all others, is the right to life.

"Evangelium Vitae" calls us to work for the legal protection of unborn human beings and human beings struggling with severe mental and/or physical disabilities. This January in Washington, D.C., hundreds of thousands of people will pray, rally and "march for life" to protest the 1973 Supreme Court decisions Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton legalizing abortion in all 50 states of our nation.

"Evangelium Vitae" also calls us to work for laws that ensure families are nurtured, poverty is attacked at its root causes, those with disabilities are cared for and welcome in society, and the basic needs of food, shelter and medical treatment are denied to no one.

It is fitting that in January, as the U.S. bishops support the annual March for Life, they also call for greater awareness of, and action against, poverty in the United States.

On Oct. 5, 1995, Pope John Paul II celebrated Mass at Giants Stadium in East Rutherford, N.J. In his homily, he challenged Americans with a message that remains as pressing as ever:

"When the unborn child — 'the stranger in the womb' — is declared to be beyond the protection of society, not only are America's deepest traditions radically undermined and endangered, but a moral blight is brought upon society.

1. "The Gospel of Life" is for the whole of human society. To be actively pro-life is to contribute to the renewal of society through the promotion of the common good. It is impossible to further the common good without acknowledging and defending the right to life, upon which all the other inalienable rights of individuals are founded and from which they develop.

A society lacks solid foundations when, on the one hand, it asserts values such as the dignity of the person, justice and peace, but then, on the other hand, radically acts to the contrary by allowing or tolerating a variety of ways in which human life is devalued and violated, especially where it is weak or marginalized.

Only respect for life can be the foundation and guarantee of the most precious and essential goods of society, such as democracy and peace. There can be no true democracy without a recognition of every person's dignity and without respect for his or her rights.

Nor can there be true peace unless life is defended and promoted. [from "Evangelium Vitae," 101]

2. The Church well knows that it is difficult to mount an effective legal defense of life in pluralistic democracies, because of the presence of strong cultural currents with differing outlooks.

At the same time, certain that moral truth cannot fail to make its presence deeply felt in every conscience, the Church encourages political leaders, starting with those who are Christians, not to give in, but to make those choices which, taking into account what is realistically attainable, will lead to the re-establishment of a just order in the defense and promotion of the value of life.

Here it must be noted that it is not enough to remove unjust laws. The underlying causes of attacks on life have to be eliminated, especially by ensuring proper support for families and motherhood. A family policy must be the basis and driving force of all social policies. [from "Evangelium Vitae," 90]

Mining the facts

Many of us awoke to blaring newspaper headlines a little more than a week ago. The men trapped in the Sago Coal Mine in West Virginia were safe!

After more than 40 hours in a carbon monoxide-filled mine, 12 miners had somehow survived. Late night news reports showed ecstatic family members gathered at a church. Mothers and daughters, friends and neighbors burst into laughter and song praising God's providence for sparing the miners.

You could feel a TV movie in the making as you watched the jubilation. How compelling; a crisis in a small town that responds by gathering together in prayer and then — a miracle!

But the information was all wrong. The miners, all except one, did not escape and the joy quickly turned to anger and hurt.

The misinformation apparently started when someone overheard a cell phone conversation that the miners had been found and assumed that they were alive. The media dutifully looked for a culprit but couldn't find anyone. West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin was singled out in the "what went wrong" stories because he repeated the "found alive" rumor when he was caught up in the joy of the moment.

The media assumed that an elected official should know all, even if news organizations did not.

A day after the tragedy, most of the satellite trucks were gone, looking as they always do for the next hurricane, the next tsunami, the next tragedy. Of course the media didn't blame itself for its page-one, extra-large headline mistake. News organizations were quick to point out that they merely reported what was generally known.

This brings us to an eye opening reality about the news media. It doesn't necessarily report the truth; it reports the best information available at the time.

Usually this is truthful, but don't count on it, especially if events reach an apparent conclusion when the hour is very late. Because this particular bit of erroneous information came in close to deadline for many newspapers, including The Charlotte Observer and USA Today, there wasn't time to confirm the rumor before the printing presses rolled with a headline that goes into the "Dewey Defeats Truman" category of gigantic newspaper blunders.

Perhaps it was an understandable mistake. But I think a page one headline saying "We were wrong and we are sorry" would have been appropriate penance for the news organizations that brought false hope into so many homes.

Bonding, sharing at Mass

I had the good fortune of going to daily Mass with my mom one day over the holidays. This is not an ordinary event for me as my mom lives many miles away in Connecticut.

While I attend Mass on Sundays and holy days, my mother has been attending daily Mass since her recent retirement.

This particular day was Dec. 29 — the anniversary of my brother's passing away 20 years ago. He was 25 when he died, a year older than I.

My siblings and I always make an effort to get in touch with our mother on this day. If possible, one of us tries to be with her. So it was meaningful for me to be able to go to Mass with her. It is at Mass where she is most able to find comfort in her grief.

The church is big, and people sat throughout it — about 75 people there that morning, scattered about the pews.

While it seemed that holding hands during the "Our Father" was not the practice in her parish, a lack of warmth and brotherly love is certainly not an issue among the parishioners.

During the shaking of hands, while we did shake the ones near us, everyone in the parish waved to each other. People were doing 360 degree turns and waving. The waving was like those in Miss America pageants — a straight hand that twists gently at the wrist — and it goes on for quite some time.

Everyone acted as if they knew each other — not because they all live in the same town and had a connection, though it was true for some, but, as my mother later explained, because they all come to morning Mass so often. They know each other's faces.

After the hand shaking and hand waving, everyone returned to their personal and prayerful selves. This group of people appeared different to me now — they were no longer just a scattered group of individuals gathered for Mass, but a community of people who recognized the bond they shared.

When the Mass ended, a few people lingered to chat, but most whisked off in their cars, on to their own errands, families, maybe even jobs. I felt a sense of contentment. This had been a nice way to start the day, especially this day, and especially with my mom.

McDowell County home to angelic parish

MARION — In 1945, the nearest Catholic churches to the town of Marion were dozens of miles away — to the west in Swannanoa, north in Spruce Pine and east in Hickory. In a predominately Baptist-Methodist community that was sometimes less than friendly to Catholicism, it was the perseverance and fidelity of that first tiny group of Catholics that led to the establishment of Our Lady of the Angels Church in Marion and a permanent presence in McDowell County.

Father William McShea, a priest who lived at the Hickory Hotel in the mid-1940s, traveled to Morganton, 22 miles from Marion, each Sunday to celebrate Mass in the home of a non-Catholic family. Later, Father McShea's successor, Father James King, traveled to Marion to celebrate Mass in the county courthouse.

The first Mass was offered Jan. 21, 1951, and a mustard seed was sown.

In 1953, the Marion Catholic community of five families purchased a house on South Main Street and determinedly prepared it for use as a chapel. The musty, plaster-cracked house was badly in need of repairs.

With money raised through bake sales, rummage sales, bazaars and other fundraising events, the building was spruced up. Father Kenneth Parker, then-pastor of the Marion parish, was installed as the first resident pastor of Immaculate Conception Church in Forest City and subsequently, Our Lady of the Angels Church became its mission parish.

With the establishment of the Diocese of Charlotte in 1972, the church was canonically established as a mission St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton, under the spiritual guidance of Father Joseph McCarthy.

Eventually, the small community began to raise funds for a new church. In 1970, property was purchased and on Sept. 26, 1976, Marion Catholics, along with Father Paul Wilderotter, recognized the completed construction of their church with a solemn dedication Mass celebrated by then-Bishop Michael J. Begley.

In 1979, Father John Murray became pastor of St. Charles Borromeo Church, followed by Father Kenneth Whittington in 1992. Additionally, Marion Catholics were served by Fathers Richard Evert and John Tuller.

The late Deacon John Gallen, a permanent deacon of the Diocese of Charlotte, is remembered for his leadership in ministerial life. A beautiful stone grotto for Our Lady was built in his memory. The grotto overlooks the entrance of the church, offering a serene place for contemplation.

In the 1990s, further growth was fostered by Father Jerome Aung Shwe, a priest from Burma in residence at Marion. Our Lady of the Angels Church began offering a full Mass schedule, including a Spanish-language Mass for the growing Hispanic population.

On Sept. 18, 2003, Father Gnanapragasam Mariasoosai came to serve as resident priest and administrator of Our Lady of the Angels Church. Originally from the Archdiocese of Madurai in South India, he served as pastor of St. Joseph Church in Spanish Town in Jamaica before coming to Charlotte.

Since Father Gnanapragasam's arrival, the parish has enjoyed a new level of spiritual and community life, revitalized through the dedicated commitment shown by its administrator, who has learned two new languages and cultures.

Parishioners have responded to Father Gnanapragasam with grateful affection, and service to the church and community has grown significantly with active ministries including RCIA; prison ministry; visitation of the sick, elderly and homebound; service and contributions to McDowell Missions; bereavement committee; Meals-On-Wheels; community outreach; social committee; Spanish Bible study and adult faith formation.

There has been a marked increase in faith formation enrollment, reception of sacraments and Catholic ecumenism. A group of Our Lady of the Angels parishioners attended the diocesan Eucharistic Congress in September 2005 and the parish has participated in the Marion City Christmas parade twice.

Through Father Gnanapragasam's leadership, the parish has moved forward in fulfillment of a vision: that the parish should be one Catholic family despite language barriers; that it should anticipate the needs of an increased Catholic population; and that it should be a model of a basic Christian community.

A poignant example of the fruits of that mustard seed sown more than 50 years ago took place on the feast of Our Lady of the Angels in August 2005, when a bilingual novena to the parish's patroness culminated with the first public eucharistic procession down Main Street in Marion.

BAG O' PRAYERS

Debbie Schmucker of Newark, Del., was looking for a creative way to keep her 11-year-old son from watching too much television, and designed this nylon Prayer Bag that holds 14 plastic disks that have a different prayer or intention on each side.

Mother markets 'prayers in a bag'

NEWARK, Del. (CNS) — Debbie Schmucker was looking for a creative way to keep her 11-year-old son from watching too much television. She found one, and she has turned her idea into a product that promotes prayer among children.

Schmucker, of St. John the Baptist-Holy Angels Church in Newark, designed the Prayer Bag, an 8-by-8-inch yellow nylon bag that holds 14 plastic disks with a different prayer or intention on each side.

She offers five versions of the bag — prayers for ages 5-7, ages 8-11, bedtime, first Communion and mealtime. A child reaches into the bag to pull out a disk and then decides which of the two prayers or intentions to use.

A few of the disks are blank; if a child picks one of them he can choose his own prayer topic.

Schmucker said the bag has proved to be a good educational tool for her two children.

"It's made my children more aware of what prayer can do and what prayer is. They hear different ways of praying, different words you can use," she said.

"It has raised the awareness that as a Catholic this is something you do not do because you are told to, but because you want to develop a relationship with the Lord."

The Schmuckers have used the mealtime version of the bag to expand their prayers beyond the traditional blessing.

"Mealtime and bedtime are supposed to be times when the family is together," Schmucker said. "It gives the parents a chance to interact with the child."

Schmucker began selling the Prayer Bag on the Internet and at two retail locations just before Thanksgiving. The roots of the Prayer Bag were planted six years ago when Schmucker used to fill an empty tissue box with pictures of activities for Michael.

"The thought is to keep kids involved in something, so that they do not turn to the television," she said.

Now Schmucker wants to help children in other families develop their own fun memories as well as a strong prayer life.

"Praying and developing a relationship with God," she said, "is one of the best gifts you can foster in life."

Fake stem-cell claim shows need for ethics, says bishops' official

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A South Korean doctor's fake claim that he produced embryonic stem-cell lines from human cloning shows that "good ethics" is the backbone of good science and medicine, said a U.S. bishops' pro-life official.

It also proves that human cloning is far from being a viable source of embryonic stem cells that could be used in treating diseases, said Richard Doerflinger, deputy director of the Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

"Lawmakers can best respond to this scandal by enacting a complete ban on human cloning ... and by increasing government support for stem-cell research that is both medically promising and morally sound," he said Jan. 10.

Doerflinger criticized the scientific hoax after South Korea's Seoul National University issued reports in December saying that claims by university researcher Hwang Woo-suk that he had created 11 stem-cell lines from cloned human embryos were false.

When Hwang announced in February 2004 that they had gotten stem cells from cloned human embryos, it was praised as a major breakthrough in medical research. In another apparent breakthrough, Hwang announced in May 2005 that his team had created 11 stem-cell lines that were genetically matched to patients.

"Will our society insist on exploiting more hundreds of women, and creating and destroying many more thousands of helpless human lives, in pursuit of this mirage? Or will we step back and realize that good ethics is a necessary and integral part of good science and good medicine?" he asked.

The U.S. bishops have opposed human cloning for stem-cell experimentation because it involves destroying the embryo, which is considered human life. The bishops have supported research with adult stem cells and stem cells derived from umbilical-cord blood.

No crime in Vatican during papal transition, says judge

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Despite the massive influx of visitors to the Vatican during the period of papal transition in April 2005, for two weeks that month robbers and criminals stayed away, or at least decided to be on their best behavior.

A Vatican judge reported Jan. 13 that from the day of Pope John Paul II's death April 2 to his funeral April 8 and the first seven days of Pope Benedict XVI's pontificate, starting with his election April 19, the 108-acre Vatican City State was without crime.

Nicola Picardi, promoter of justice for the Tribunal of Vatican City State, said no crimes were reported and no charges were brought to the Vatican's court during those two weeks in April, a fact he called extraordinary, considering "at least 6 million people" flooded the Vatican during this period of papal transition.

"Experience has taught us that the number of charges and reports" of criminal activity greatly increase during times when "huge crowds of pilgrims and tourists converge" on the Vatican, he said.

Picardi said per capita crime rates in Vatican City State remain high, however.

He said that in 2005, 472 criminal cases were reported — almost one crime per resident for a country with only 492 inhabitants — and 486 civil suits were brought before the court.

Such high rates do not mean Vatican City State citizens are "more litigious" or delinquent, he said, since the number of cases involving Vatican residents was negligible.

The high per capita crime rate stems from the sheer volume of people — some 18 million each year — that stream through the Vatican to visit St. Peter's Basilica and the Vatican Museums, he said.

Pope condemns efforts to offer abortion pill, urges family protection

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In a talk that touched on controversial election-year issues in Italy, Pope Benedict XVI condemned efforts to introduce the abortion pill and urged steps to protect the traditional family based on marriage.

The pope made the remarks Jan. 12 in a speech to civil officials of the Rome region. His comments prompted an immediate flurry of reactions across the political spectrum in Italy, where general elections will take place in April.

The pope thanked the officials and the population of Rome for the strong religious sentiments they showed during the death and funeral of Pope John Paul II last year. That kind of spiritual intensity, he said, should bear fruit in the civil arena, especially on family issues.

In particular, he said, young couples and their families need support — for example, in paying for housing, nursery schools and kindergartens. Such assistance for the traditional family should not be seen as a concession to Catholic morality, but as respect for "elementary truths regarding our common humanity," he said.

"It is a grave error to obscure the value and functions of the legitimate family founded on marriage, attributing to other forms of union an improper legal recognition for which, in reality, there is no real social need," he said.

The pope called for protection of the unborn. He said it was especially important for the state to provide concrete forms of assistance to pregnant women who face financial and other difficulties.

Furthermore, he said, the state should avoid introducing "drugs that hide in some way the serious nature of abortion" as a "choice against life." The pope was referring to attempts in Italy to introduce the RU-486 abortion pill in some regions on an experimental basis, which has also surfaced as an election issue.

The pope's comments brought praise from Italian Health Minister Francesco Storace, who last year blocked some regions from experimenting with the RU-486 drug and who wants pro-life groups to be allowed to counsel women seeking abortions.

Leaders of Italy's Communist Refoundation Party said the pope was interfering in political questions.

Protesting the 'Culture of Death'

Death penalty opponents sing in front of San Quentin State Prison late Jan. 16, shortly before the execution of convicted murderer Clarence Ray Allen, 76, in San Quentin, Calif. San Francisco Auxiliary Bishop John C. Wester said the execution contributes to the "culture of death." Allen, a Choctaw Indian who was deaf, legally blind and had difficulty walking, was pronounced dead at 12:38 a.m. Jan. 17. He was convicted for ordering the murders of three people in 1980.

Meeting aims to help people learn to coexist amid their diversity

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Catholic organizers expressed hope that a Washington meeting of major world religious leaders April 26-27 will help people learn to live together amid their diversity after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks sparked a focus on their cultural differences.

"It is a duty to underline that coexistence is possible in this world during the difficult period after 9/11," said Italian Msgr. Ambrogio Spreafico, vice president of the Sant'Egidio Community, a Rome-based lay organization that is the meeting's main organizer and one of its sponsors.

"People in the U.S. are living in coexistence but are unaware of it. There are tensions," he said. "We think dialogue is the answer to the clash of civilizations."

The meeting is called the 2006 International Prayer for Peace. It will be held at Jesuit-run Georgetown University, meeting sponsor. The other sponsors are The Catholic University of America and the Archdiocese of Washington.

New altar servers blessed

Hispanic participation rising at Hickory parish

HICKORY — The Hispanic community at St. Aloysius Church is becoming more involved in the celebration of the Mass.

During the Dec. 12 Mass celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis on the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe, 28 new altar servers were blessed — 26 of whom are Hispanic.

"That day was an exciting one for us servers since we have worked hard to buy the vestments by selling food after Mass and holding raffles," said Antonio Garza, 16, who has been an altar server for four years.

"As part of the ceremony, each of the altar servers had sponsors aiding them in getting dressed in the new vestments and carrying out the responsibilities of being altar servers," he said.

When Antonio first started altar serving in 2001, there were only two Hispanic altar servers. Antonio credits the recent addition of 26 Hispanic altar servers to Father Jose Enrique Gonzalez-Gaytan, parochial vicar.

"When Father Enrique arrived (in July 2003), he began to recruit young people to serve in this ministry," said Antonio. "Like the Hispanic community, the number of altar servers began to increase. Thanks to his commitment, we have 26 (Hispanic) servers and we're still recruiting."

"Father Enrique had the great idea of working on this ministry and the results are these dynamic children and youths very dedicated to their ministry," said Laura Garza, parish director of Hispanic ministry and Antonio's mother.

"They really take it seriously and with great responsibility," she said.

Soon after his arrival, Father Gonzalez began weekly faith formation classes for the Hispanic parishioners.

"The significance for the parish is that the Hispanic community is increasing and that the youths are getting involved in our parish life," said Garza, a native of Mexico.

"It is not easy in our days to see more than 20 children and youths getting together every week to practice and to learn more about our faith with so much enthusiasm," she said. "They are setting the example for other youth to join our parish activities and ministries."

Antonio said being an altar server is beneficial in many ways.

"Aside from the many roles an altar server can perform during Mass, I have learned much about the Catholic Church and the Catholic faith in general," he said. "Every week at Mass is a new experience and lesson for me, whether I am serving or not."

"Serving has brought me closer to my friends and to my faith," said Antonio. "It has enriched me and made me a better servant of God."

During the Mass, 17 new extraordinary ministers of holy Communion also were blessed. Father Gonzalez had prepared the group for several weeks prior, with classes on the liturgy of the Eucharist and how to serve in the role.

"These celebrations are a new experience for our parish and they show the dedication and willingness of our people to serve our parish and, overall, to serve God," said Antonio.

FUNDS WILL HELP BRING 'BRIGHT IDEAS' TO OUR LADY OF GRACE SCHOOL

COURTESY PHOTO

Marvin Norman of EnergyUnited presents a Bright Ideas grant for $1,000 to Katie Houston, second-grade teacher at Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro, and Father James Ebright, parochial vicar of Our Lady of Grace Church, during the school's weekly Mass Nov. 30, 2005. Teachers also received gift bags with special supplies for their classrooms.

The funds will enhance and enrich the school's annual multicultural program, which focuses on four different countries each year.

This year, kindergarten-through-third-grade students will study Antarctica, Germany, Mexico and Kenya.

Laurie Kennedy-Malone, school board vice-chairperson, worked with the faculty to write the grant proposal.

The Bright Ideas program was initiated 10 years ago by North Carolina's electric cooperatives to provide classroom teachers with money for projects that otherwise would not be funded. Since then, the cooperatives collectively have awarded Bright Ideas grants totaling more than $2 million to teachers in kindergarten-through-12th-grade levels across the state.

EnergyUnited is a utility company that serves more than 110,000 electricity customers in 19 North Carolina counties.

Catholic students bring outreach, hope

Costa Rica for their service trips. This year, they chose a small, predominantly African-American Catholic school in Mississippi as the place they needed to be.

"We all felt honored and privileged to serve the people of Pascagoula in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina," said Julie Ostergaard, Catholic campus minister at Wake Forest and Salem.

"Seeing photos or watching news coverage of the damage to people's homes gives just a glimpse of the magnitude of the destruction," she said.

Putting aside aches in their backs, splinters in their fingers and blisters on their feet, the students worked hard to help out at St. Peter the Apostle School.

"My church and my school were completely destroyed. My rectory and the convent were flooded with 4 feet of water. It's terrible here," said Josephite Father William Norvel, pastor of St. Peter the Apostle Church in a Sept. 16 interview with the Denver Catholic Register, archdiocesan newspaper.

"We waited until a month after the hurricane struck before we began making phone calls to the Gulf Coast," said Ostergaard.

They were eventually directed to Sister Bernadette McNamara, principal of St. Peter the Apostle School, part of which had been deemed unsafe and demolished.

"She said they needed storage buildings. The items they had salvaged from their main building, which had collapsed onto itself during the storm, were taking up space in the small classrooms of the remaining building."

With a discount from Lowes Home

Improvement and a generous donation from a student's father to cover the cost of the materials, the college students ordered the materials needed to build four storage sheds.

Upon arriving at the school, the students' expectations changed — St. Peter the Apostle School did need the four storage sheds, but they also needed much more help than the students realized.

While some of the students built the sheds, others hauled away debris that had accumulated since the hurricane's aftermath. Glass and trash were picked up so children could play in the fields around the school. The college students filled in puddles of standing water with wheelbarrows full of sand.

"Students picked up nickel-sized shards of glass from the schoolyard, a meticulous task which took two days to fill five garbage bags full," said Ostergaard.

The students spent the rest of their week working in rotating teams to attack projects as quickly and efficiently as possible. Some cleared trash, others sorted through donations of food and clothing from a FEMA trailer.

"It had been on the school property for weeks, with no one having the time to empty it," said Ostergaard. "Our students tirelessly emptied out its contents," throwing away ragged clothes and "carefully sorting the remaining clothes into labeled boxes."

Some went out into the Pascagoula community, giving away basic necessities and supplies, while others transported school supplies and desks to the new sheds.

By the end of the week, the students had finished their tasks — four sheds were standing in addition to the help given to the community of Pascagoula. But for many of the students, the most important aspect of the trip was the fellowship they shared with the residents of Pascagoula, especially the playtime with the children during work breaks.

"At the end of the week, our skills had improved as English majors learned how to build a wooden frame, computer science majors hammered tar paper and shingles onto shed roofs and division I football players got tagged by first-graders in a game of touch football," said Ostergaard.

Many of the residents shared their hurricane experiences with the college students, inspiring them to work harder. Several volunteers said they saw God in the faces and words of the people they were helping.

"Many people here have nothing. I mean nothing," said Ruth McGee, one of few parishioners at St. Peter the Apostle Church who still have homes. "But it seems like people out there care, even though we're just lowly little old Mississippi."

For Father Norvel, one of the more uplifting moments in the aftermath of the hurricane came when he greeted the volunteers, whom he likened to angels of mercy.

The last day at St. Peter the Apostle

School, Sister McNamara thanked the college students for their hard work, which was showcased on news stations in Mississippi.

"Our college students chose to give up part of their Christmas break to serve other people," said Ostergaard. "Our nightly reflections and daily Masses helped us to reflect each day on the people we met in Pascagoula and to remember we are united with them through the love of God."

"We, as Americans and as Catholics, have the privilege to reach out to others and to assuage some of their suffering during this time," she said.

"Repeatedly, the men and women we met there, rich and poor alike, asked us to remind others not to forget about them as their stories fade from the limelight and from the media," said Ostergaard. "They do not want to be forgotten."

Hard work, dedication and ... attitude

Abbey alum, BB&T president to share business secrets

BELMONT — How do they do it, the Donald Trumps, Bill Gateses and Sandra Day O'Connors of the world? How do you get on the right path to success?

One man says he knows. He thinks the blueprint to success in life may have a lot to do with your attitude.

Belmont Abbey College alum Luis Lobo, president for BB&T's Washington Metropolitan Region, will discuss his book, "It Is Your Attitude," at the college Feb. 1. The event, co-sponsored by Belmont Abbey College and BB&T, is free and open to the public.

Lobo has treaded professional ground that few Hispanics have in order to become regional president of BB&T's Potomac Region. But Lobo says that writing the book "was never a commercial interest."

"It was my way of communicating some of my life's events coupled with broad observations over the last 20 years in the banking industry," said the native of Costa Rica who grew up in Lincoln, N.C.

"It Is Your Attitude" covers a variety of subjects, including how and why people fail or under perform; dealing with fear of failure; and 10 practical tips for improving your attitude.

The book features a real-world case study that shows the difference attitude can make within a business community.

Lobo said he believes people fail for several reasons. They may have a sense of entitlement and believe, even after a series of setbacks, that success will be served to them on a platter.

"People driven by this fear are so focused on doing everything possible to avoid a setback that they lose balance with their personal, familial and spiritual lives," he said.

Lobo earned degrees in economics and business administration in 1983 from Belmont Abbey College.

In 2005, Belmont Abbey College inducted him into its inaugural Distinguished Alumni Wall of Fame.

WANT TO GO?

Luis Lobo will discuss "It Is Your Attitude" in the Student Commons at Belmont Abbey College at 7 p.m. Wednesday, Feb. 1. The event is free and open to the public.

Nation's bishops, Catholic college heads to have local dialogues

WASHINGTON (CNS) — At a Jan. 10 meeting in Washington, the U.S. bishops' Committee on Education approved a set of questions to guide local dialogues nationwide between diocesan bishops and the presidents of Catholic colleges and universities in their diocese.

The dialogues are to be conducted by May 3, the date on which "The Application of 'Ex Corde Ecclesiae' for the United States" took effect five years ago.

"Ex Corde Ecclesiae," Latin for "from the heart of the church," is Pope John Paul II's 1990 apostolic constitution on Catholic higher education, which set norms to assure the Catholic mission and identity of Catholic colleges and universities worldwide and called on national bishops' conferences to establish implementing norms applying the general norms within the context of their own countries.

Bishop Robert J. McManus of Worcester, Mass., chairman of the education committee, said that the guiding questions were themselves the result of a dialogue process between bishops and Catholic college and university presidents.

Questions deal with Catholic identity and character of the colleges and universities, communion with the local church, incorporation of the spirit and norms of "Ex Corde" and continued dialogue.

Auxiliary Bishop Walter J. Edyvean of Boston, who chairs the committee's Subcommittee on Bishops and Catholic College and University Presidents, said the five-year progress review was called for by the U.S. implementation norms, not the Vatican document.

Specific questions that could arise in some of the local dialogues, such as possible revision of some institutions' statutes in light of the new Vatican and U.S. norms, would depend on individual bishops and presidents.

Bishop McManus said the guiding question on incorporation of the spirit and norms of the Vatican and U.S. documents includes a reference to dialogue on the implementation of the ecclesiastical "mandatum," or authorization to teach, that the norms say a Catholic theologian must have to teach in a Catholic institution of higher learning.

The relationship of faculty to Catholic identity and mission is the major theme to be discussed at the Feb. 4-6 annual meeting of the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities, whose members are presidents of the country's Catholic higher education institutions. They collaborated with the education committee in drafting the guiding questions that will set the framework for the upcoming five-year review dialogues.

Richard Yanikoski, ACCU president, said that the feedback he receives from bishops and presidents "has been positive, helpful, and I think bodes well both for the institutions and the dioceses in fostering a constructive relationship than has been typical in the last several decades."

ARE YOU BEING CALLED TO THE HARVEST?

Then he said to His disciples, "The harvest is abundant but the laborers are few; so ask the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers for His harvest." (Mt 9:37)

I am praying that you will join me in responding to our Lord's request for more "laborers" in harvesting the abundant fruit to be found at Belmont Abbey College. Over 125 years ago the Benedictine Monks came south in response to God's call to begin His work in the vineyard of North Carolina.

He is calling you to place your hands upon the same bricks that were formed and put in place by these holy monks so long ago. I am looking for strong, dedicated, Catholic students to help realize our vision of excellence and virtue. Belmont Abbey is your Catholic College and God is calling you to the "harvest."

Human trafficking bill can be better, USCCB official says representative of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

"In general, I think the revisions are solid and necessary and the allocation of money is good," said Sister Mary Ellen Dougherty of the bishops' Migration and Refugee Services.

Sister Dougherty, a member of the School Sisters of Notre Dame and manager for outreach, education and technical assistance in MRS' human trafficking program, said the final version of the bill "didn't go far enough for us as far as children are concerned."

She said the legislation, called the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act, fails to empower Department of Health and Human Services officials to make decisions about the eligibility of children (to receive refugee benefits) "without having to wait an unreasonable amount of time."

She also wanted to see more steps taken to make sure that immediate guardians are appointed to children who have been trafficking victims.

Sister Dougherty praised the legislation for making human trafficking a "criminal offense under the uniform code of military justice" and for "increasing penalties for domestic trafficking."

She also commended the legislation's inclusion of residential treatment facilities for juveniles who had been subjected to trafficking.

The bill renewed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, the first comprehensive federal law for the prosecution

"Make no mistake, this law will protect women and young girls at home and abroad and is a victory for victims of this abhorrent crime."

— Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J.

of traffickers. Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., was the chief sponsor of both bills.

According to estimates by the Congressional Budget Office, the new legislation will provide $361 million over the next two years to combat trafficking.

Smith said the new trafficking legislation "provides law enforcement with the necessary tools to continue the liberation of the unfortunate women and children who are forced into horrific, abusive conditions."

"Make no mistake, this law will protect women and young girls at home and abroad and is a victory for victims of this abhorrent crime," he added.

The legislation reauthorizes and expands appropriations for anti-trafficking programs in the United States and abroad and offers solutions to specific scenarios, such as peacekeeping missions, to combat trafficking problems.

It authorizes programs geared toward reducing the demand for commercial sex in the United States and preventing human trafficking of U.S. citizens within the country. It also provides new funding for the FBI's investigation of domestic and international trafficking.

The legislation also:

laundering, racketeering and civil and criminal forfeiture statutes.

— Requires that the State Department include in the annual Trafficking in Persons Report information on the steps taken by international organizations to prevent the involvement of their personnel with trafficking.

— Terminates all government grants, contracts and cooperative agreements with contractors who engage in human trafficking or procure commercial sex acts during the period when the grant is in effect.

— Establishes a grants program through the Department of Health and Human Services to assist American citizens who are victims of human trafficking and directs the department to establish a program to create residential treatment facilities for juveniles subjected to trafficking.

— Establishes a grants program for states and local law enforcement totaling $50 million in 2006 and 2007 to investigate and prosecute those who traffick in people and criminals who purchase commercial sex acts within the United States.

Prior to signing the legislation in a ceremony attended by MRS officials Margaret MacDonnell, Nyssa Mestas and others, Bush described human trafficking as "an offense against human dignity, a crime in which human beings, many of them teenagers and young children, are bought and sold and often sexually abused by violent criminals."

"Our nation is determined to fight and end this modern form of slavery," he said.

Program helps re-energize, invigorate catechists, educators

Minn., presents workshops nationally on various issues such as addiction, abuse, self-esteem, empowerment, spirituality, and grief and loss.

"With humor, she made us feel good about ourselves," said Anne Stowe, pastoral assistant at St. Andrew the Apostle Church in Mars Hill. "She really made us understand that we are God's partners. We can relax and work with God."

Sometimes, Stowe said, her job can seem routine, but Sister Berns "made me feel it's a privilege again. I feel energized."

Father James Hawker, vicar of education for the Diocese of Charlotte and pastor of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill, opened the program, reminding the attendees of the importance of community.

"In the story of the paralytic, four people brought him to Jesus," Father Hawker said. "Forward in faith together, and that's what we are."

He added, "The mission is bigger than all or any of us, because the Holy Spirit guides us in our complementarity. Diversity is diversity of ministry and diversity of culture."

"There are layers of complementarity and diversity, but it all comes together at moments like this (day of recollection)," he said.

"We hesitate to identify with Jesus, but we are Jesus. We all must have certain qualities, (be) approachable, respectful, welcoming," said Father Hawker.

Balance and burnout

"We work with the people of God as a person of God to touch each person and avoid compassion burnout," Sister Berns said.

Compassion burnout happens when people let their ministries' demands deplete them to exhaustion, leaving them no reserves of strength.

"When you fill someone else's bucket, yours also gets full," Sister Berns said. "Stay away from those who simply drain your bucket. Giving away too much of yourself leaves you burned out."

Balance in ministry meshes religion and spirituality.

"Religion teaches the principles of faith," she said. "Anyone can learn the principles. Living (those principles) is the spirituality. Rigidity is fear-based."

For ministry, a balanced life is essential through self-care: making sure one engages in healthy practices such as eating properly, getting enough rest and exercise, developing interests outside of ministry, having caring friends, taking time for prayer and meditation.

It's also important, she said, to maintain spiritual balance: surrender, which means letting go, realizing that "something bigger is in charge";

"Religion teaches the principles of faith. Living those principles is the spirituality."

— Franciscan Sister Geneva Berns purification, through practices such as reconciliation; living in the now instead of staying in the past or focusing on the future; recognizing those "epiphany" moments of special understanding; living and loving wisely and learning from mistakes; staying authentic — being the person one really is.

"If I don't have time for God, if I work all the time, my life is not balanced," Sister Berns said. "If there's a 'God hole' (an absence of God) in us, we fill it with drugs, gambling, work, shopping, sex, other addictions."

Shadows of shame

So how does someone develop an authentic core within himself or herself?

"That core is like a candle wick," Sister Berns said. "If it's not strong, it can't stay straight to burn evenly and it drowns itself."

Don't criticize others but rather affirm them and help them to accept themselves as they are, she advised.

"A person whose flame has gone out needs to be fanned into flame," she said. "They may always have had others make their decisions so they haven't been affirmed in making decisions for themselves."

Someone with high self-esteem doesn't compare himself or herself with others, but those with low self-esteem have been told they lack something.

Sister Berns asked if anyone had been told he or she wasn't beautiful, talented, or anything else he or she might be lacking.

"Shame is the blackest cloud hanging over us," she said. "Shame tells us we're not enough. So don't focus on the negative. If you focus on the positive, the negative will take care of itself."

Overcoming loss

Other areas that affect a balanced life are past hurts that others have inflicted and the losses everyone suffers.

Forgiveness of those who have caused hurt can be very freeing.

"Whenever I can't let go of someone who hurt me, I handcuff myself to that person," Sister Berns said. "Know who's living in your head rent free."

Acknowledging loss can also ease hurt.

Franciscan Sister Geneva Berns speaks during "A Day Apart for Reflection and Renewal" at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory Jan. 12. The program was for campus ministers, catechists, Catholic school educators, parish catechetical leaders and youth ministers.

"What are the tears going on in your life: losing someone you love, job loss, other losses?" she asked. "Make a cloth heart, tear it to represent the loss, then journal about it to grieve the loss."

Richard Borsuk, of St. James the Great Church in Concord, said he's planning to start a ministry similar to a "Theology on Tap" discussion group.

He appreciated Sister Berns' talk about "relationships with people, building people up instead of tearing them down, trying to understand where people are coming from."

"All of us are on some path to holiness," Sister Berns said.

JUDGING A JUDGE

Alito hearings hit many topics, make clear his possible votes on few

BY PATRICIA ZAPOR
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — By the time Judge Samuel Alito Jr.'s Senate confirmation hearings finished Jan. 13, he had answered around 700 questions over the better part of three days, and spent nearly the same amount of time listening to senators explaining their own views and parsing his answers.

Alito, a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals since 1990, spent hours responding to questions on everything from his judicial theories to his membership in a controversial group called Concerned Alumni of Princeton.

And while some Democratic members of the Judiciary Committee in particular never seemed happy with Alito's answers, it appeared likely he would be approved by both the committee and the full Senate. Floor debate and a vote of the full Senate would follow the Jan. 24 scheduled vote of the committee.

Among the subjects pursued persistently by senators on the committee was abortion and whether Alito might be likely to vote to overturn laws, including Roe v. Wade, that made it legal.

He also fielded questions about his views on the separation of church and state, immigration and capital punishment, amid the hours of back and forth on legal precedents and his rulings as a judge.

Like other recent nominees to the court, Alito declined to be specific when senators attempted to get him to explain how he might vote in certain types of cases that might come before the court.

And despite the attention given to the religious beliefs of the previous nominee for the same seat, almost no mention was made of the Catholic nominee's personal religious influences.

Alito was named to replace White House counsel Harriet Miers as President George W. Bush's nominee to the Supreme Court. Miers withdrew her name amid a chorus of criticism about her credentials for the position.

With few of Miers' personal legal writings to consider, some of her supporters emphasized her membership in an evangelical Protestant church as the basis for arguing that she would be likely to vote in opposition to legal abortion.

At Chief Justice John Roberts' confirmation hearings in September, he was asked how being Catholic might influence his approach on the court.

"There's nothing in my personal views based on faith or other sources that would prevent me from applying the precedent of the court faithfully," Roberts said.

In response to later questions, he said he rules strictly on the basis of law, not on his faith: "I don't look to the Bible or any other religious sources."

Alito's response to the same question was similar.

"My personal religious beliefs are important to me in my private life," he told Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., who is also a Catholic.

"But my obligation as a judge is to interpret and apply the laws of the United States and not my personal religious beliefs," he said.

If confirmed, Alito would become the fifth Catholic on the court. Until Roberts was named, the three Catholics then on the court was a record. Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas also are Catholic.

Questioning aimed at figuring out how Alito might rule on cases over abortion and other areas of law received less direct responses than did the one about his religious beliefs, however.

For example, in response to Durbin's question about whether Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision legalizing abortion, is "settled law of the land," Alito responded:

"It is a precedent. If settled ... it can't be re-examined, then that's one thing," Alito said.

"If settled means that it is a precedent that is entitled to respect as 'stare decisis,' and all of the factors that I've mentioned come into play, including the reaffirmation and all of that, then it is a precedent that is protected, entitled to respect under the doctrine of 'stare decisis' in that way," he said.

"Stare decisis" is a legal term meaning that once an issue has been decided in court, all future cases with similar circumstances follow that precedent. One argument for keeping abortion legal is that the "right" to abortion is settled law and therefore should continue.

Book of Psalms of The Saint John's Bible published

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

COLLEGEVILLE, Minn. — The Liturgical Press of St. John's Abbey in Collegeville has announced the release of the Book of Psalms of The Saint John's Bible, a full-color reproduction of the first handwritten illuminated Bible to be created in 500 years.

The 9.75-by-15-inch hardbound Psalms volume is about two-thirds the size of the hand-illuminated vellum pages that form the original manuscript.

The 80-page Book of Psalms is the second published volume of what will eventually be a seven-volume work. The first volume, Gospels and Acts, was published in 2005.

The entire 1,150-page illuminated Bible manuscript is slated for completion in 2007. The $4 million project began in 1998 when the Benedictine monks of St. John's Abbey commissioned one of the world's foremost calligraphers, Donald Jackson, to serve as artistic director and illuminator.

Jackson is senior scribe to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth's Crown Office.

In conjunction with the publication of Psalms, St. John's Abbey announced a schedule of its "Illuminating the Word" exhibit tour featuring more than 60 actual manuscripts, examples of preliminary sketches and tools of the artists, and explanations of the nature and history of the monumental project.

In 2006 it will be shown at locations in Nebraska, Texas and Oct. 6-Dec. 15 at the Library of Congress in Washington.

"I believe the Book of Psalms will be one of the favorite books to see when the Bible is exhibited," said Benedictine Father Michael Patella, chairman of the Committee on Illumination and Text, which oversees the project.

For the text of Psalms, Jackson created a distinctive font with a lighter-weight script than is being used for the rest of the Bible to underscore the poetic, musical character of the Psalms.

The Saint John's Bible is divided into seven groups of biblical books: Pentateuch, Historical Books, Wisdom Literature, Psalms, Prophets, Gospels and Acts, and Letters and Revelation.

Jackson and his team of artists and calligraphers use quill pens and other traditional tools, colors, inks and metals to write and illuminate the biblical text on sheets of vellum, or fine calfskin. Like some of the great medieval Bibles, each bound volume will measure 2 feet by nearly 3 feet when laid open.

But modern computer technology has also been used in a variety of ways, from planning the layout of the entire work to creating high-resolution digital photos of each manuscript page for reproduction in book form and in separate fine art prints that are available for purchase from Liturgical Press.

The art itself also incorporates modern technology. For example, for the five major "choir book" illuminations in Psalms, Jackson took musical recordings of the Psalms, including Gregorian chant, and converted them into a digital format on a computer.

He created voice prints on the computer screen with colorful patterns and wave formations that he photographed and used as one of the thematic unifiers through all five of the brilliant red, blue and gold illuminations.

Artistic renderings of those patterns also float in gold on the margins and between texts throughout the book.

The New Revised Standard Version of the Bible, a translation widely used throughout the English-speaking world, was used for the text and notes.

Never doubt God's word, Jesus' authority

BY DAN LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Years ago a routine chest X-ray revealed, in the ominous terminology of medical reports, "an anomaly," a quirk the doctor couldn't quite explain.

I was advised to consult other physicians more expert in thoracic medicine, more adept at interpreting the mysteries of radiology. The internist suggested that it would probably be safe to go slow, checking periodically for a few years to spot any changes.

The radiologist acknowledged that this particular film was outside his area of expertise, but his advice was emphatic.

"If it were my X-ray," he said, "I'd have that nodule taken out."

When I expressed my anxiety, he suggested I consult a thoracic surgeon. If the surgeon, with all his experience, thought it prudent to wait, it probably was.

When I finally met the surgeon, his demeanor was quite different from the other two doctors. He was thorough and attentive as the others had been, but he spoke with unique authority, the fruit of decades of diagnostic instinct and surgical experience.

I immediately sensed that his advice would be prudent and wise, and knew I would follow it, regardless of its direction. Happily, the intervening years proved his conservative, wait-and-see advice sound.

My "anomaly" remains stable.

In Sunday's Gospel, synagogue participants who hear Jesus' teaching and witness his dominion over the spirit of captivity are "astonished" and "amazed" because, they say, he teaches with authority.

Jesus doesn't cite experts or statistical evidence to authenticate his vision of God's love and truth. He teaches and acts from the unique experience of one who knows not simply "about" God, but God himself.

When it comes to speaking on God's behalf — the heart of prophecy — who could be more trustworthy than Jesus, God's very Word become one of us? As the new year unfolds, may we listen with confidence to that Word.

Questions:

What helps you to recognize and respond to the authority of Jesus? What is one way you can listen to the Word with greater openness?

Scripture to Illustrate:

"The people were astonished at his teaching, for he taught them as one having authority" (Mark 1:22).

Advertisements, ringtones, programs help to attract vocations

BY PATRICIA KASTEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

GREEN BAY, Wis. — Although religious habits aren't seen too often on television, Wisconsin viewers saw them on advertisements this past fall during the "7th Heaven" and "Gilmore Girls" series on the WB network.

A marketing study by the Franciscan Sisters of Christian Charity in Manitowoc showed that television programming with religious or moral messages reaches their target group of college-age women who are open to the call to religious life.

The study confirmed what Sister Julie Ann Sheahan of the order's vocations office had already suspected.

"Young women in contact with our vocation office have told me how decisive and selective they try to be when deciding which programs to watch or Web sites to visit," said Sister Julie Ann. "Most do make TV viewing choices based on their faith beliefs."

So the sisters developed a series of six television advertisements — to complement current radio and print advertising — built around the community's signature line: "The world needs you. God calls you. We invite you."

Various sites where the sisters are stationed, including St. Peter's Mission School in Bapchule, Ariz., and St. Francis of Assisi Parish in Greenwood, Miss., were used in filming the commercials.

Television advertisements may seem a unique way to search out vocations, but Sister Julie Ann said that, while "personal invitation is always best, we became convinced that real conversations can begin by using the language of images and music."

The order's Web site — www.fsccll.com — also offers free ringtones featuring a woman singing the words "called to be," part of the nuns' "Peace and All Good" theme song.

"As consecrated women we are encouraged by our church to make known the beauty and truth of our lives through the marvels of technology," Sister Julie Ann said. "We hope our simple, beautiful 'called to be' ringtone may inspire young women to discover and discern their unique call from God."

Many methods

The Franciscan sisters aren't the only ones to use advertisements to promote vocations, particularly near National Vocations Awareness Week, which was Jan. 8-14.

In the Diocese of Providence, R.I., the annual vocations awareness campaign features a 30-second television commercial that has been aired locally on cable stations such as Animal Planet, Comedy Central, ESPN, TNT and TV Land since the last week of December and will run until the end of January.

The commercial opens with Providence Bishop Thomas J. Tobin standing in front of the Cathedral of SS. Peter and Paul, followed by footage of priests performing baptisms, delivering sermons and ministering to the sick.

"Catholic priesthood is a life of sacrificial love," the bishop says. "I believe that Jesus continues to call others today into this life of service. If you or someone you know is considering the priesthood, please log onto our Web site, catholicpriest.com."

In Pittsburgh, the Capuchin Franciscan Friars of the St. Augustine province are trying a more long-term approach to increasing vocations. In December, they began a new novitiate program that brings together 14 men from eight of the order's provinces to spend a year at St. Conrad Friary in McCandless Township.

'Grandma's Boy' should be evicted

Allen Covert and Doris Roberts star in "Grandma's Boy," an unspeakably bad comedy about a video-game tester who moves in with his grandmother after he's evicted for nonpayment of rent. Nonstop gross-out humor, rough and crude language, sexual situations and innuendo, nudity, heavy drug use, hedonistic worldview. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is O — morally offensive. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted. Under 17 requires accompanying parent or adult guardian.

While the program results in part from a decrease in vocations, it also recognizes that "a lot of what we learn we learn through a peer group," said Capuchin Father William Wiethorn, co-director of the novitiate.

Individually, each province's numbers were small. By bringing them together the order can offer a more extensive preparation period. The Capuchins also wanted to build a sense of brotherhood in an order that is represented around the world.

Capuchins today number more than 11,000 friars active in 101 countries. At the end of their year the novices will profess temporary vows and return to their home provinces to continue studies toward the Capuchin priesthood or brotherhood.

"This is a highly spiritual year, with a lot of prayer, and input from us, and experts in Franciscan spirituality coming in from different provinces," Father Wiethorn said.

"A very strong emphasis is on our brotherhood. We want them to be willing to work and do things together. That's important," he said.

Contributing to this story were Michael Brown in Providence and Patricia Bartos in Pittsburgh.

Court rejects federal effort to prohibit physician-assisted suicide

WASHINGTON (CNS) — In a 6-3 ruling, the Supreme Court Jan. 17 upheld Oregon's physician-assisted suicide law, rejecting the U.S. attorney general's attempt to use federal drug control laws to stop doctors from prescribing lethal doses to people who are terminally ill.

Writing for the majority, Justice Anthony Kennedy said although the federal government may apply drug laws to states, the "authority claimed by the attorney general is both beyond his expertise and incongruous with the statutory purposes and design."

If the attorney general's argument were to stand, the government could apply the same logic to other types of medical judgments, Kennedy wrote.

"He could decide whether any particular drug may be used for any particular purpose, or indeed whether a physician who administers any controversial treatment could be deregistered," or effectively barred from practicing medicine, Kennedy wrote.

The attorney general would have such power even though the law limits his authority to the registration and control of drugs "and despite the statutory purposes to combat drug abuse and prevent illicit drug trafficking," he said.

Kennedy was joined in the majority opinion by Justices John Paul Stevens, Sandra Day O'Connor, Stephen Breyer, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsberg. Justice Antonin Scalia wrote a dissenting opinion, in which he was joined by Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Clarence Thomas. Thomas also wrote a separate dissent.

In his dissent in Gonzales v. Oregon, Scalia said it was perfectly valid for the Justice Department to define "legitimate medical purpose" in applying its own regulation, and to conclude that the term cannot be applied to intentionally assisting suicide.

"Our presumption that the Controlled Substances Act creates a uniform federal law regulating the dispensation of controlled substances ... means that this objective standard must be a federal one," he wrote.

Scalia also took issue with the majority's finding that assisted suicide is a legitimate medical practice.

"The fact that many in Oregon believe that the boundaries of 'legitimate medicine' should be extended to include assisted suicide does not change the fact that the overwhelming weight of authority (including the 47 states that condemn physician-assisted suicide) confirms that they have not yet been so extended," he wrote.

"If the term 'legitimate medical purpose' has any meaning, it surely excludes the prescription of drugs to produce death," he concluded.

In an amicus, or friend-of-the-court, brief urging the court to uphold the federal restrictions on lethal drugs, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and other church organizations argued that assisting suicide is not a legitimate medical purpose. In fact, the brief said, establishing a medical distinction between assisted suicide and effective pain control has led to more effective treatment of pain.

Oregon became the first state to legalize physician-assisted suicide when voters passed the Death With Dignity Act in 1994. The law took effect after a 1997 voter initiative to repeal the statute failed. Oregon remains the only state to permit physician-assisted suicide.

FIGHTING FOR LIFE

Abortion not 'American way,' march organizer says continue to be killed. It just continues on and on and on."

That's why the theme for the 33rd annual March for Life Jan. 23 in Washington is "Roe v. Wade Violates the American Way."

The 2006 march will take place the day after the anniversary of the U.S. Supreme Court decision that lifted most state restrictions on abortion, since Jan. 22 falls on a Sunday this year. The march always takes place on a weekday to permit marchers to visit the offices of their representatives in Congress afterward.

"Marchers for life educate Washington officialdom at all three branches of our government that a preborn human person, with an unalienable right to life, exists at fertilization, and that abortion kills a preborn human, traumatizes mothers and fathers, and assaults all members of our society, including feminists/abortionists," according to materials distributed by the March for Life.

Pro-life events

Groups from the Diocese of Charlotte are planning to participate in the March for Life.

Because of construction, this year's march has a different starting point — Seventh Street and the National Mall, the long park west of the Capitol. The March for Life usually begins at the Ellipse, located between the White House and the Washington Monument.

But the 2006 march, which begins at noon Jan. 23, will be surrounded by the usual complement of pro-life events and activities.

The National Prayer Vigil for Life opens Jan. 22 at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington with an 8 p.m. Mass celebrated by Cardinal William H. Keeler of Baltimore.

The vigil — sponsored by the basilica, the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities and The Catholic University of America — also includes a rosary for life, night prayer, Holy Hours, morning prayer and the opportunity for confession.

It ends at 7:30 a.m. Jan. 23 with a Mass of penance and prayer.

Special events for young pro-lifers include the American Collegians for Life student leadership conference Jan. 21 on the Catholic University campus and a rally for life and youth Mass on the morning of Jan. 23 at Washington's MCI Sports Arena.

The March for Life Education & Defense Fund also is sponsoring an educational convention Jan. 21-22 at the Hyatt Regency Washington Hotel on Capitol Hill.

Scheduled events include talks by Archbishop Raymond L. Burke of St. Louis and Bobby Schindler, the brother

Coast to coast

In addition to the anti-Roe events traditionally staged in the nation's capital, two major marches are also planned for the West Coast.

In San Francisco, thousands are expected to take part in the second annual Walk for Life West Coast Jan. 21.

The 2005 event was the first large-scale Roe v. Wade anniversary demonstration to be held in the Bay Area. It drew 7,000 pro-lifers.

As they walked along the city's waterfront, the marchers at times were met with jeers and crude signs from many of the 3,000 abortion supporters who staged a counterdemonstration.

In a statement on the Web site for this year's march, organizers told pro-life participants to expect the same reaction but to remember their own event is to remain peaceful.

"Please come prepared to be 100 percent peaceful. Our witness to peace in the face of such vile hostility is our greatest contribution to the pro-life movement," the statement said.

In Los Angeles, the archdiocesan Commission for Catholic Life Issues and Hispanics for Life are sponsoring a March for Life/Life Chain Jan. 22.

Participants, also expected to be in the thousands, will meet at Our Lady of the Angels Cathedral and then process with pro-life signs through the streets of downtown Los Angeles.

The event "will be a reflection of the cultural diversity of the Catholic Church, which is uniting in prayer to end the 33-year slaughter of our unborn brothers and sisters. Hispanics in particular are overwhelmingly pro-life," said Astrid Bennett Gutierrez, board member of Hispanics for Life.

In endorsing the event, Cardinal Roger M. Mahony of Los Angeles said the "Life Chain is a way to make the proclamation (that) to be human is to be called to protect life and to promote human dignity."

Healing past hurts and anger

Turning to Jesus is key to healing

If you are struggling with the pain of past hurts and unresolved anger, please read this column.

Buried resentments are difficult to escape. The embers of anger may keep burning, but there is always grace. With God's help, spiritual healing is possible.

Lots of people suffer from this kind of emotional distress. They want to heal their wounds, but they don't know how.

"The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. There is not soundness, only bruises and bleeding wounds, but the wounds are not softened with oil" (Is 1:5, 6).

Whenever the pain of life becomes too much for you, turn immediately to Jesus. He may seem to ask the impossible, but his words supply the healing balm of wisdom, a wisdom that will soften the wound with oil. Here is the formula for success.

Think about what Jesus said the night before he died. He explained his purpose on earth in these words, "I have told you all these things that your joy may be full."

Among his teachings we find the mandate to forgive. Jesus told us to forgive because he wanted us to be free of emotional pain.

The Lord also asks you to forgive your "enemy" not once but "70 times seven." What does that mean in practical terms?

It means that to get rid of the distress you will need to forgive the one who hurt you. Holding onto resentment will only diminish your capacity for joy.

You can break free! There are three things to consider in order to get started.

—First, admit that you have been deeply hurt and that you are angry. Don't go into denial about it. Repressed anger will only cause more distress.

—Second, accept the fact that you must treat your wounds in order for

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

them to heal.

—And third, decide to treat them by doing what Jesus asked of you — namely, forgive the other person whether you feel like it or not.

Forgiveness is in the will. You don't have to have good feelings toward the person when you forgive him or her. Good feelings will come in time.

Forgive the person as an act of obedience to the Lord. This may sound impossible at first, but blind faith in the power of God will enable you to heal.

You do not even have to face the person who hurt you. You can do this spiritually — that is, by simply approaching that person in your imagination. Forgive him or her in the privacy of your own heart.

You do this not necessarily for the benefit of the other person; you do it for the Lord and for yourself.

You never have to force feelings of any kind when you forgive. Put the issue of your feelings aside for now, and forgive because Jesus asks it of you.

Some bitterness may linger for a time, but if that happens say a short prayer for the person each time, a "Hail Mary" perhaps. This will serve as a sign to you that you have decided to forgive and forget.

To forgive is to turn off the furnace that fuels the resentment. Once that is done, all you need to do is wait patiently. Time heals all wounds.

If you need help in this process, try talking to a friend or a trusted priest. The sacrament of reconciliation brings God's grace to the healing process. The confessional experience can soothe a troubled soul.

Restoring unity among Christians requires prayer, pope says

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The restoration of full unity among Christians is a "holy cause" that requires prayer even more than human efforts, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The pope focused on ecumenism at his weekly general audience Jan. 18, the first day of the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity.

Departing from his prepared text, the pope also announced that his first encyclical, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love"), would be released Jan. 25, the closing day of the week of prayer.

Although the encyclical is not specifically tied to the theme of ecumenism, he said, "the foundation is ecumenical because God's love and our love is the condition for unity among Christians and for peace in the world."

In his prepared text and in extemporaneous remarks, Pope Benedict said Christians must pray and work for unity, but they also must give thanks to God for the progress already achieved in bringing Christians closer together.

Pope Benedict said much hard work has led to a rediscovery of brotherhood among different Christians, to strong bonds of solidarity among them, and to a growth in unity and in agreement about matters of faith, although "certainly in an uneven way in the various dialogues" with different churches and communities.

Pope Benedict said the prayer week is an occasion for Christians "to reflect on the drama of the division of the Christian community and together to ask Jesus 'that all would be one so that the world might believe.'"

"Public and private prayers, the conversion of hearts and holiness of life" must be the centerpiece of efforts to restore Christian unity, he said, because the key problem is "obedience to the Gospel in order to do the will of God with his necessary and effective help."

The faith that Christians share, despite their divisions, is what gives them the possibility of praying together, he said.

"Communion in Christ supports the whole ecumenical movement and is the reason for seeking the unity of all Christians in the church of God," he said.

"This is what distinguishes the ecumenical movement from every other initiative of dialogue and relationship with other religions and ideologies," he said.

Pope Benedict said that, like Pope John Paul II "who did so much and suffered so much for the ecumenical questions," he would celebrate the end of the week of prayer Jan. 25 at Rome's Basilica of St. Paul Outside the Walls.

"I will pray with our Orthodox and Protestant brothers and sisters and thank God for all he has given us and pray that he will guide us on the path to unity," the pope said.

"We continue to pray because we are aware that the holy cause of the re-establishment of Christian unity is beyond our poor human efforts and that definitive unity is a gift of God," he said.

Holy Angels thanks its many supporters

Holy Angels is so fortunate to be located in the Diocese of Charlotte. As we celebrate our 50th anniversary this year, we do so knowing the support that has been shown through the years will continue. Our recent holiday season is an example of the great love and support of the Catholic community.

On behalf of our residents and staff, Holy Angels would like to say thank you to the individuals, companies, churches, schools and other groups who supported us so generously this Christmas season.

So many shared with us their time, talents and treasures. Our residents received gifts of beautiful music from Christmas carolers, presents from Santa, delicious food, equipment, clothing and much more. Donations were sent to Holy Angels in memory and in honor of loved ones.

The year 2006 will continue to be filled with joy at Holy Angels. With your help, Holy Angels is able to provide a home of unconditional love and unlimited possibilities for children and adults with mental retardation and physical disabilities, many of whom are medically fragile.

We ask for your continued prayers and support during the coming year. Thank you again and please accept our best wishes for a healthy and prosperous New Year.

Was there ever a woman pope?

Q. In a discussion about popes, a friend stated that a book he once read claimed there were two female popes in the Catholic Church. If this is true, who were they and when were they popes? (Delaware)

A. Every once in awhile the legend surfaces, usually in some anti-Catholic tracts, about a Popess Joan. This is possibly what you remember.

The story of Popess Joan is a bizarre one that first appeared in the 13th century, nearly 300 or 400 years after she was alleged to have lived. After a distinguished career as a scholar, she disguised herself, so the story goes, so effectively that she became a priest, a cardinal in the Roman Curia and finally pope.

She reportedly reigned for two and one-half years as Pope John Angelicus (or Joan or Gilberta; stories vary), sometime between the years 800 and 1100. Her sex was discovered when she gave birth to a child during a papal procession near the Colosseum.

According to one variation of the tale in an appendix of J.N.D. Kelly's Oxford Dictionary of the Popes, she died on the spot and was buried. Because of the scandalous event popes thereafter avoided using the street.

The legend is given no credibility whatsoever by historians. I know of no other supposed woman pope in the history of the church.

Transubstantiation and faith?

Q. Recently you explained how the moral character of the priest or other minister of a sacrament does not affect the validity of the sacrament.

Along the same line, a priest said a few weeks ago, as I understood him, that the transubstantiation of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ at Mass takes place through the "faith of the congregation."

I'm a convert to the Catholic faith, but that would seem to make the validity of the Eucharist very subjective. Could he be right? (New York)

A. I have a strong suspicion that whatever the priest said was seriously misunderstood. This is not a point of Catholic doctrine easily mistaken.

Especially during the Reformation years, some Protestant theologians seemed of the opinion that the eucharistic presence of Christ depended on the strong faith of the congregation. If people didn't believe in his presence during the liturgy, he was not there.

That idea has been contrary to Christian faith since the first century. Catholic theology and doctrine have never come close to such a theory.

The Catechism of the Catholic Church echoes our ancient belief several times. "In the institution narrative (during the Eucharistic Prayer)," it says, "The power of the words and the action of Christ, and the power of the Holy Spirit, make sacramentally present under the species of bread and wine Christ's body and blood" (No. 1353).

It is the power of Christ's act and the power of the Holy Spirit that effect the transformation of the elements into the body and blood of our Savior through the words of the priest. Lack of faith may diminish the spiritual effects of the sacrifice and sacrament for an individual believer, but it cannot nullify the action of Jesus and his Spirit.

Why Hollywood takes such an interest in Pope John Paul II

Over the last few months, three films on Pope John Paul II have appeared on television along with several documentaries. Why are filmmakers in such a rush to create competing versions of the late pope's life?

One answer is that the pope's life was filled with the perfect ingredients of a good movie: pathos, intrigue and tragedy.

At an early age he lost his mother. His brother died when the future pope was 12, then as a young man he lost his father. When his father died, he confided it was the loneliest moment in his life.

Some three years later, he was struck by a car and came close to dying.

No doubt, many of us who have experienced similar losses identify closely with John Paul II. His suffering endears him to us.

Another reason for fascination with him is his historic stature. He helped bring down communism in Poland. And much of Pope John Paul's work behind the scenes is responsible also for the collapse of communism in Europe.

Add to this that he went to Israel and asked forgiveness for the sins Catholics committed against the Jews, and we have two of many extraordinary and historic moments in his life.

His appealing personality was made for Hollywood. No matter what language he spoke, the words rang with dramatic feeling. He endearingly revealed his human side when he joked with audiences, especially with young people. His love for young people, along with his athleticism and infectious smile, blessed him with an attractive youthfulness of his own.

In those early days, the young Karol Wojtyla realized that God's breath is in everyone and must always be respected because it is the basis of our dignity. In the late pope's talks, we hear a man who truly loves us because he recognizes God's breath in us.

When we marvel at Pope John Paul's energy, it is more than physical stamina we admire. It is the breath of God energizing him.

What is most attractive about him is that he energized us to desire a fuller life and to defend and promote the divine dignity with which God endowed all human-kind. His example taught us to seek not so much respect for ourselves but to generate respect for others in inspiring ways.

In this formula we have the makings of the best Hollywood script any screenwriter could hope to produce!

Reporting back on Wal-Mart

Updated on responses to poor working conditions

A few months ago I wrote about three Bangladeshi garment workers whom I heard speak at St. Joseph's University in Philadelphia. They explained that they were forced to sew garments in hot factories with poor ventilation, 14 to 18 hours a day, six to seven days a week, for approximately 17 cents an hour.

I asked readers to write to the chief executive officer of Wal-Mart, Lee Scott, requesting he use his considerable influence to help improve the miserable wages and inhumane conditions endured by workers in factories producing goods sold by his corporation.

Specifically, the National Labor Committee asked us to urge Wal-Mart to take steps with these factories to ensure that all garment workers receive one day off a week, three months paid maternity leave, humane working conditions and 20 cents more for each garment they make.

I requested readers to send their letters to me so that I could forward them in bulk to Scott. Realizing that most people — even concerned people — do not write letters to legislators or corporate CEOs, I expected to receive only about 30 letters.

Wow! Was I surprised!

More than 700 schoolchildren, elderly folks, priests, sisters, brothers, teachers, doctors, business leaders and homemakers responded. After reading every single heartfelt letter, I mailed them off to Wal-Mart and awaited a response.

Early in the new year, Beth Keck, Wal-Mart's director of international corporate affairs, called me. And now I am reporting back to you as I promised.

Keck said there are 200 auditors working to ensure that factories contracting with Wal-Mart are in compliance with their own national labor laws.

However, Barbara Briggs, senior associate for the National Labor Committee, told me that this auditing has no transparency: "It is completely under the control of Wal-Mart, and it is not published."

By conducting off-site interviews with workers, "we have learned that these factories often have serious human rights violations," said Briggs, explaining that it is quite common for workers to labor 70 hours a week; many work between 80 and 100 hours.

Because workers are paid on average 17 cents an hour, they feel compelled to submit to these grueling schedules in order to put food on the table.

When I asked Keck if Wal-Mart would disclose the names and addresses of every factory that produces garments for their stores so that independent investigations could be conducted, she said they are considering it. But she expressed concern over the added administration costs.

Briggs said Wal-Mart has detailed control over its international vendor supply system and that it would be a small cost to reveal who their suppliers are.

Briggs said that it is very important that the public keep up the pressure on Wal-Mart until real change occurs.

To learn how you can continue to help, visit the National Labor Committee at www.nlcnet.org and get on their e-mail list. If you do not have access to the Internet, please call the NLC at (212) 242-3002 and ask that information on the Wal-Mart campaign be periodically mailed to you.

Briggs assured me that we have made a difference here. For the sake of these poor workers, let's keep at it!

Immaculate Conception Church a diverse parish in Rutherford County

FOREST CITY — A Catholic presence had been established in Rutherford County as early as the 1840s, but the faithful had no place in which to worship together until more than a century later, when Immaculate Conception Church was dedicated in 1950.

Starting in the 1880s, churchgoers could travel to Shelby in Cleveland County to attend Mass in a mission church established by the Benedictines of Mary, Help of Christians Abbey (today Belmont Abbey). About six Catholic families made the journey in those early years.

During the 1940s, Belmont Abbey's multi-county "nullius" (not under diocesan jurisdiction) status was reduced to Gaston County alone, and the remaining parishes were placed under diocesan jurisdiction. Consequently, Msgr. Lawrence Newman, pastor of St. Mary Church in Shelby, led an effort to establish a mission in Rutherford County.

Local Catholics, with assistance from the Catholic Extension Society, began construction of a new church and named it in honor of the Immaculate Conception. Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh dedicated the structure in September 1950.

The church remained a mission for the next 22 years, although the Immaculate Conception community welcomed its first resident pastor, Father Kenneth Parker, in 1969. The parish was comprised of 25 families at the time. Also, a mission community in Marion — later to establish Our Lady of the Angels Church — was placed under Father Parker's pastoral care.

In January 1972, the Diocese of Charlotte was formed. As such, Immaculate Conception Church became a parish.

With continued growth came the need for enhancements to the church facility. A rectory and parish hall complex was constructed, and then-Bishop Michael J. Begley of Charlotte dedicated the new building in December 1978. Our Lady of the Angels Church became a mission of St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton in 1981.

Father Gabriel Meehan was appointed pastor in 1986. During his pas-

Father Jose Antonio Juya, administrator of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton, assists Father Herbert Burke, Immaculate Conception Church's current pastor, in the church's Hispanic ministry by celebrating some of the Spanish-language Masses each month.

Deacon Andrew Cilone has served the parish since his ordination to the permanent diaconate in 1983. With his unique talent as a singer, Deacon Cilone, who previously sang with well-known performer Bobby Vinton, leads the parish in song at weekend Masses.

Father Burke has added eucharistic adoration and recitation of the rosary preceding three of the four Sunday Masses. Many parishioners like to come

Saturday evenings Father Burke joins the youth group for social and spiritual activities, including recitation of a decade of the rosary and a Bible study emphasizing apologetics.

Father Burke also heads up the

ABORTION NOTIFICATION LAW

WASHINGTON — In a rare unanimous decision in an abortion-related case, the Supreme Court Jan. 18 reversed a lower court's ruling that struck down New Hampshire's parental notification law.

The opinion written by retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor sent back to the appeals court the issue of the law's lack of an exception in cases where the teen's health is at imminent risk from continuing the pregnancy.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops welcomed the ruling, saying she hoped "it will end the disposition of lower courts to enjoin the enforcement of reasonable common-sense abortion regulations for years while challenges are appealed."

HOLY GOALIE

Chicago Auxiliary Bishop Thomas J. Paprocki prepares to get on the ice after suiting up to practice with the Chicago Blackhawks Jan. 12. Bishop Paprocki, 53, who has been playing hockey since he was a boy, was profiled in the December issue of USA Hockey magazine and was pictured wearing his episcopal robes and holding a hockey stick.

Hockey-playing Chicago bishop skates with Blackhawks

CHICAGO (CNS) — The puns are obvious: "Who IS that masked man?" "Stick with me, kid." And, of course, "Hey, fella, you're on thin ice."

But in this case, the "fella" would be Chicago Auxiliary Bishop Thomas J. Paprocki — all dressed up in a Chicago Blackhawks uniform and ready to take to the ice at the United Center.

Neither is it all for show.

Bishop Paprocki, 53, has been involved with hockey for a long time — as a fan and a player.

He was profiled in the December issue of USA Hockey magazine, where he was pictured in his episcopal robes holding a hockey stick and helmet.

The article's headline, appropriately enough, was "Holy Goalie."

Bishop Paprocki has been playing floor hockey since he was a boy, but it's only been in the past decade that he's taken to the ice. Now, twice a week he plays at McFetridge Ice Center stopping pucks in an over-30, no-check league.

The bishop is also a veteran marathon runner, which he does just to stay in shape for hockey.

The feature in USA Hockey led to an invitation from the Blackhawks to attend a team practice Jan. 12 and get a little ice time with the team.

"I was in the net and facing the Blackhawks. Several players took shots at me," he said. "I stopped several until one of the players said, 'Has anyone scored yet?'"

"On the next shot, Mark Bell ripped one past me," said the bishop. "Then Denis Savard came over and took a few shots. My head is still spinning from his moves, but I think I did manage to stop at least one of his shots."

However, Bishop Paprocki conceded that he "lost count of the ones that went through."

It was a day he'll never forget, he said.

Is a career on the ice in the offing? The bishop laughed and said, "None of the Blackhawk goalies should feel their jobs are threatened — and the cardinal doesn't have to worry that I'm going to give up my day job."

Would-be papal assassin ordered back to prison in Turkey

Agca claims he is 'Messiah' at police station

ROME (CNS) — The Turkish terrorist who shot and seriously wounded Pope John Paul II was ordered to return to prison, where he was expected to remain for several years.

On Jan. 20 the Turkish Supreme Court overturned a lower court's release of Agca eight days earlier. Agca's release had prompted widespread criticism in Turkey and around the world.

Agca, 48, was apprehended by police at his home and offered no resistance when he was taken back into custody. As he entered a police station in Istanbul, he shouted in several languages, "I am Messiah. I am not the Son of God, I am Messiah."

Agca has frequently made wild and fanatical claims to the press and to justice officials.

Agca had served 19 years in Italian prisons for shooting the pope in 1981. He was extradited in 2000 to Turkey, where he served five years for the 1979 murder of a liberal Turkish newspaper editor.

In early January, a Turkish court cited new penal laws and the time served in Italy and said Agca could be set free. Prosecutors appealed the decision, and the Supreme Court said there was no legal basis for deducting the time Agca spent in Italian prisons from his sentence in Turkey.

Turkish officials had not yet decided how long the papal assailant would remain in prison, but news reports said he could serve time until 2014.

The Vatican had reacted to Agca's release with official indifference, saying the decision was up to the Turkish court system. Several church officials, however, had emphasized that Pope John Paul forgave his would-be assassin.

Pope asks Christians to end discrimination against migrants

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI called on Christians to shun all forms of discrimination and welcome the migrants in their midst.

Marking the Vatican's celebration of World Day for Migrants and Refugees Jan. 15, the pope called on people to recognize the benefits of migration and overcome "every form of discrimination, injustice and disdain for the human person, because each person is an image of God."

Addressing visitors in St. Peter's Square after reciting the midday Angelus prayer, the pope said the movement of people is a "sign of the times."

While the movement may be voluntary or forced, legal or clandestine, motivated by work or study, Pope Benedict said, the arrival of newcomers from far away can lead to a knowledge of and respect for ethnic and cultural differences.

Pope Benedict expressed hope that Catholics would help their communities overcome "difficulties of acceptance and integration" as they welcome migrants and refugees.

In his main Angelus talk, Pope Benedict focused on the Sunday Gospel reading in which Jesus invites Andrew and John to follow him, telling them, "Come and see."

The pope said Jesus' words offer guidance for the new year, which should be "a time in which we renew our spiritual journey with Jesus in the joy of seeking him and finding him always."

"The truest joy" people can have comes from meeting, following, knowing and loving Jesus, the pope said.

A constantly renewed effort to know and love Jesus more deeply is necessary not because Jesus changes — "Christ is the same yesterday, today and always" — but because "we, our world and history are never the same," he said.

Pope, church officials have full schedule of ecumenical events

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — By mid-January, Pope Benedict XVI and the Roman Catholic Church already had a full schedule of ecumenical events planned for 2006.

The Catholic-Orthodox international commission is scheduled to meet in September for the first time in six years. Commission members plan to return to the theological discussion of church authority and primacy abandoned in the 1990s as Catholics and Orthodox struggled to overcome tensions caused by the renewed life and activity of the Eastern Catholic churches after the fall of communism.

While the Anglican Communion continues to deal with internal tensions created by differences over homosexuality and the Church of England — the Anglican mother church — considers ordaining women bishops, Vatican officials said contacts would continue, although both issues raise questions for possible unity.

However, the official launching of a new phase of the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission will have to await a decision by the Anglicans' Lambeth Conference, scheduled to meet in 2008.

The Catholic-Lutheran dialogue is nearing completion of a document on "the apostolicity of the church," looking at the continuation of church teaching and tradition from the time of the apostles.

The document had been scheduled for completion last fall, but after Lutherans and members of some Reformed churches entered into eucharistic sharing agreements in Germany, new questions arose about the need for an ordained minister to preside at the Eucharist.

The Catholic-Methodist dialogue is scheduled to finish work by July on a statement about how far each community can go in recognizing the church of God present in each other. The World Methodist Council also is scheduled to vote in July on formally adopting the 1999 Catholic-Lutheran agreement on justification.

The Catholic Church and a group of Pentecostal churches are working on a document explaining what both mean by "baptism of the Holy Spirit" and its role in the salvation of individual Christians.

While the dialogues continue and several of them prepare to complete important documents, the highlight in ecumenical relations for the Catholic Church in 2006 is expected to be Pope Benedict's planned November meeting with Ecumenical Orthodox Patriarch Bartholomew of Constantinople.

The pope hopes to travel to Istanbul, Turkey, for the feast of St. Andrew, patron saint of the patriarchate.

'I regret my abortion,' say women

A man carries his young son past women holding signs reading "I regret my abortion" during a Silent No More rally in uptown Charlotte Jan. 19. Eight women spoke to a group of about 30 people and many passersby about their experiences as post-abortive women. The Silent No More campaign has three main goals: to make the public aware that abortion is harmful emotionally, physically and spiritually to women and others; to reach out to women who are hurting from an abortion and let them know help is available; and to invite women to speak about abortion's negative consequences.

For abortion myths and realities, see ROE REALITY CHECK on page 8.

Memory garden brings healing, hope to family contractions. During labor, an ultrasound showed that there was no movement from the baby — the umbilical cord was wrapped three times around Tanner's neck.

When Gardner-Williams and her husband, Todd Williams, were told Tanner was stillborn, all the dreams they had had for their son vanished in an instant.

"The happiest day of our lives was when we found out we were pregnant," said Gardner-Williams. "His name was picked out as soon as we found out it was boy ... so his identity was well established by Sept. 28."

In the months that followed, the Williamses struggled to deal with their grief. Neither had practiced the Christian faith in many years — Gardner-Williams was raised Catholic, while her husband was raised Methodist.

"It was really hard for us, because we didn't have a faith to fall back on," said Gardner-Williams. "Tanner's death brought me to St. Pius."

Shortly before Christmas, Gardner-Williams found herself at St. Pius X Church in nearby Greensboro.

Although she had not been to Mass or reconciliation in nearly 20 years, Gardner-Williams entered the confessional and poured out her grief and guilt to Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor.

"I thought (Tanner's death) was a punishment," said Gardner-Williams. "He (Msgr. Marcaccio) said God is merciful and is not out to punish us."

"Planting a memory garden can provide healing and remembrance ..."

— Diana Gardner-Williams

Msgr. Marcaccio recommended she read Psalm 51 — "Wash away all my guilt; from my sin cleanse me. ... A clean heart create for me, God."

In addition to the comfort she found at her new church, Gardner-Williams discovered help at the Haven of Hope and Healing, a nonprofit pregnancy and infant loss center in Graham, N.C.

Just a month after losing Tanner, the Williamses, both landscape designers, began planting a "memory garden" on Williams' parents' property to honor Tanner.

"When a loved one passes, the road to healing is usually a long and challenging one," said Gardner-Williams. "Planting a memory garden can provide healing and remembrance as a tribute to a deceased loved one."

Working on weekends for the next six months, the Williamses created a beautiful, peaceful garden where they can sit and remember their son.

A family friend made a cross out of cedar, and next to it a wooden stand displays a picture of Tanner. Wind chimes and metal butterflies surround the garden's perimeter.

The Williamses planted 30 varieties of flowers and trees, most of them white to symbolize hope and purity. The garden was designed so that whatever the season, plants are always blooming — from snow bells in January, through gardenias in summer, to Christmas Lenten Roses.

On May 15, 2004, about 50 friends and family members gathered to celebrate the dedication of Tanner's memory garden.

Gardner-Williams said the date holds special significance, because May 15 is the feast of St. Isidore the Farmer, patron of farmers and rural communities. Isidore married a young woman who also became a saint, Maria de la Cabeza, and they also had a son who died as a child.

Over time, the Williamses were renewed in their faith and are now active members of St. Pius X Church. They designed and installed a memory garden at the church for parishioners to enjoy.

Just four months after the heart-breaking loss of Tanner, the Williamses found out they were pregnant again.

They weren't trying to conceive, and the second pregnancy brought more anxiety than joy.

"We got pregnant too soon, but I'm glad we did," Gardner-Williams said.

On Oct. 17, 2004, a healthy son, Shivere Joseph Williams, was born. Shivere is a derivative of two Hebrew names meaning "gift of God" and "truly giving."

Last summer, the Williamses built a home just 400 feet away from Williams' parents' home, where Tanner's garden is planted. The family often comes and sits in the garden to remember the son they lost, and celebrate the son they now have.

"Tanner brought about so much good in our lives," said Gardner-Williams. "I'd rather have him here, but we wouldn't be participating and taking classes at church ... we're more open spiritually."

Poll shows Americans see poverty increasing, fear becoming poor

NEW ORLEANS (CNS) — Nearly two-thirds of Americans are concerned that poverty will increase in the U.S. in 2006 and 63 percent are worried that they may become poor themselves, according to a new poll commissioned by the Catholic Campaign for Human Development, the U.S. bishops' domestic anti-poverty program.

Results of the national "Poverty Pulse" survey, commissioned annually by CCHD for the past six years, were made public Jan. 19 in New Orleans.

More than seven in 10 (71 percent) said they think there are more poor people today than a year ago, and more than half (56 percent) had donated money to organizations that assist the poor.

Asked how Congress should spend tax money, respondents ranked "helping the poor and needy" fourth (12 percent) behind health care (29 percent), education (27 percent) and national defense (13 percent). When asked to identify the most significant cause of poverty, the No. 1 response (18 percent) was lack of work that pays a living wage.

Nearly a third of the respondents (31 percent) said they believe the federal government has "the greatest responsibility" to address poverty.

Nearly as many (29 percent) said responsibility rests with the public, while 17 percent said the poor themselves were most responsible and 2 percent said churches were.

This year's survey was conducted by the Harris Interactive Service Bureau. Participants in the poll were 1,131 members of the general adult population.

The margin of error was plus or minus 3 percent.

Pope blesses Swiss Guards on corps' 500th anniversary

Pope Benedict recalled how on Jan. 22, 1506, "Pope Julius II welcomed and blessed the first contingent of Swiss Guards" that arrived in Rome after the pontiff requested the soldiers come to protect the pope and the Apostolic Palace.

"This is how the Swiss Guards were born," Pope Benedict said.

The pope said his special blessing for the guards was a sign of his "appreciation and recognition" of their service and fidelity.

Earlier Jan. 22, Cardinal Angelo Sodano, Vatican secretary of state, celebrated Mass for the Swiss Guards in the Sistine Chapel.

He highlighted the strength and generosity shown by the first 150 Swiss soldiers who made the four-month trek from Switzerland to Rome to protect the life and safety of the pope.

He told the guards that "we must cleanse and renew ourselves every day in our service to God and in our fidelity to his holy church."

He added that the Swiss Guards' motto of "Acriter et Fideliter," or courage and fidelity, was "a daily call" to live according to such values.

The Swiss Guards kicked off their jubilee celebrations June 21, the date Pope Julius requested the service of Swiss soldiers, renowned for their loyalty and bravery.

Commemorative events were set to continue throughout 2006, culminating in a contingent of former Swiss Guards marching to Rome from Bellinzona, Switzerland. The guards were to arrive in time to take part in the annual swearing-in ceremony of new guards May 6 in the Vatican.

The Vatican and Switzerland also were planning a series of commemorative stamps and coins to mark the 500th anniversary.

The Vatican's commemorative stamps, featuring artwork by former guard Rudolf Mirer, went on sale in November 2004 at the Vatican and in Switzerland, marking the first Vatican-Swiss stamp package.

In anticipation of the anniversary, a history of the Swiss Guard written by Sgt. Christian-Roland Marcel Richard was released in November. It was the first time that an active guard published a book describing life in the corps.

Review of ruling striking down abortion notification law ordered

Deirdre McQuade, director of planning and information for the bishops' pro-life secretariat, said the court missed a chance to address the "substantive legal questions" raised in the case, leaving more question than answers, especially about health exceptions in abortion-related laws.

Lower courts had declared the New Hampshire law invalid because it lacked a health exception. But the Supreme Court said that problem could be fixed without throwing out the whole statute.

"That law reflects the common sense principle that caring parents know best what their children need," McQuade said Jan. 19.

"But neither the lower courts nor state legislatures have been given the guidance necessary to address these issues. And that is unfortunate," she said.

The ruling made clear from its opening words that the court was not addressing abortion precedents, only the question of what remedies are available in the case of medical emergencies.

"We agree with New Hampshire that the lower courts need not have invalidated the law wholesale," wrote O'Connor.

"Only a few applications of New Hampshire's parental notification statute would present a constitutional problem. So long as they are faithful to legislative intent, then, in this case the lower courts can issue a declaratory judgment and an injunction prohibiting the statute's unconstitutional application," she wrote.

The 2003 law has been blocked from taking effect by legal challenges. It would require pregnant teens who want to have an abortion to notify a parent or guardian 48 hours ahead of time. The law provides for a judge to bypass notifying a parent under certain circumstances and for the requirement to be waived if the pregnancy puts the young woman at risk of dying.

It does not provide for exceptions when the girl's health is at risk. The state argued that such a provision is unnecessary because the judicial bypass and other state laws would cover those situations.

During oral arguments in the case at the Supreme Court in November, Justice Stephen Breyer noted that the definition of a "health risk" has been interpreted so broadly that "lots of people think of 'health' as a way of having abortion on demand," under any circumstances.

In sending the case back to the lower court, the justices said the District Court and the 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals "chose the most blunt remedy" by blocking enforcement of the statute and thereby invalidating it entirely.

O'Connor said that the conclusion "is understandable, for we, too, have previously invalidated an abortion statute in its entirety because of the same constitutional flaw." In Stenberg v. Carhart in 2000, the court struck down Nebraska's law banning partial-birth abortion because it lacked a health exception.

But, she noted, "the parties in Stenberg did not ask for, and we did not contemplate, relief more finely drawn."

In the New Hampshire case, the state recognized "the possibility of a modest remedy," O'Connor wrote, with the attorney general conceding at oral argument that "carefully crafted injunctive relief may resolve this case."

"Only a few applications of New Hampshire's parental notification statute would present a constitutional problem," the opinion said. "So long as they are faithful to the legislative intent, then, in this case, the lower courts can issue a declaratory judgment and an injunction prohibiting the state's unconstitutional application."

The justices said the lower court could address the concern about exceptions with either an injunction prohibiting some applications of the law or by finding that the Legislature's intentions require that the whole statute be thrown out if it cannot be enacted as is.

The opinion noted that 44 states have laws requiring parental notification or parental consent for minors to obtain abortions. New Hampshire is one of four states that do not provide exceptions for health risks.

The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and Bishop John B. McCormack, who heads the statewide Diocese of Manchester, N.H., had filed an amicus, or friend-of-the-court, brief urging the statute be upheld.

Roe Reality Check

BELOW ARE THE FIRST OF SEVERAL MYTHS VS. REALITIES REGARDING ROE V. WADE AND ABORTION, TAKEN FROM "ROE REALITY CHECK" ON THE U.S. CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS' WEB SITE.

Myth: "High Court rules abortions legal the first three months."

Fact: Abortion is legal through all nine months of pregnancy.

Despite the Jan. 23, 1973 claim by the New York Times that "Roe v. Wade made abortion in the first three months of pregnancy legal, the Supreme Court rules in Roe v. Wade that abortion may not be restricted at all in the first trimester. In the second trimester abortion may be regulated only for the mother's health.

After "viability," abortion may be prohibited except where necessary to preserve the mother's health.

Roe's companion case, Doe v. Bolton, defined maternal "health" as: "all factors — physical, emotional, psychological, familial, and the woman's age — relevant to the well-being of the patient."

Thus, abortion is legal — and cannot be prohibited — in the seventh, eighth or ninth months of pregnancy if any of these reasons is invoked.

"[N]o significant legal barriers of any kind whatsoever exist today in the United States for a woman to obtain an abortion for any reason during any stage of her pregnancy." (S. Rep. No. 98-149, at 6 (1983)).

Myth: Most abortions are done because of maternal or fetal health problems, or in cases of rape or incest.

Fact: Abortions are rarely done for these reasons.

According to an Alan Guttmacher Institute survey, women cite these as the main reason for an abortion in a very small percentage of cases each year: 1 percent "rape or incest"; 3 percent "woman has health problem" (physical or mental); 3 percent "fetus has possible health problem."

For all other abortions, the main reason cited is:

- 21 percent "unready for responsibility";
- 21 percent "can't afford baby now";
- 16 percent "concerned about how having a baby could change her life";
- 12 percent "has problems with relationship or wants to avoid single parenthood";
- 11 percent "is not mature enough, or is too young to have a child";
- 8 percent "has all the children she wanted, or has all grown-up children";
- 1 percent "husband or partner wants woman to have abortion";
- 1 percent "doesn't want others to know she has had sex or is pregnant";
- <0.5 percent "woman's parents want her to have abortion";
- 3 percent "other."

Under Roe v. Wade, abortions for these reasons or any other reason must be legally permitted.

Myth: Most Americans favor U.S. abortion law.

Fact: Most Americans actually oppose it.

A recent Harris Interactive poll claims 52 percent of Americans favor Roe v. Wade and 47 percent oppose it. But the poll describes Roe as "the U.S. Supreme Court decision making abortions up to three months of pregnancy legal."

That's wrong. The fact is, Roe made abortion legal through all 9 months of pregnancy.

In the same poll, 72 percent of Americans said abortion should be illegal in the second three months of pregnancy, and 86 percent said abortion should be illegal in the last three months of pregnancy.

Even support for abortion in the first three months is open to question. In a 2004 Zogby International poll, 61 percent of Americans said abortion should not be permitted after the fetal heartbeat has begun. This occurs in the first month.

So why do 52 percent of Americans say they favor Roe v. Wade? Because they don't really know what Roe did.

Sisters of Mercy celebrate 105 years serving in Asheville disease, the facility became known as St. Joseph's Hospital in 1938.

November 2005 marked the 105th anniversary of continuous service in Asheville by the Sisters of Mercy.

"We respond to the needs of the time," said Mercy Sister Maria Goretti Weldon, director of mission and values at the Sisters of Mercy Services Corporation.

Sister Weldon credits the support of the local community with being essential to the longevity of the Sisters of Mercy in western North Carolina.

"Throughout the years, the people of this area have supported us in providing quality health care to all those in need," she said.

Another reason for their success, said Sister Weldon, is that the Sisters of Mercy have lived up to their order's name. No one is turned away for financial reasons, she said.

The Sisters of Mercy of the Americas have vowed to minister to the poor, sick and uneducated, especially women and children in need. Catherine McCauley opened the House of Mercy in Ireland in 1827 as a home for working girls and orphans and a school for poor children. As other women joined her, she founded the Sisters of Mercy in Dublin in 1831.

"My hope is that we will be able to continue to serve the wonderful people of western North Carolina for many years to come."

— Mercy Sister Maria Goretti Weldon

Within 50 years of McCauley's death in 1843, the Sisters of Mercy were serving all over the world.

It was at the request of a priest at St. Lawrence Church (now the Basilica of St. Lawrence) that the first Sisters of Mercy came from their Belmont motherhouse to Asheville. Today, as in the beginning, three sisters remain and reside in the convent near St. Joseph's Hospital.

In addition to Sister Weldon, Mercy Sister Anita Sheerin serves as pastoral associate at St. Eugene Church and Mercy Sister Carmen Cruz is a chaplain at Mission Hospitals in Asheville.

Mercy Sisters Anita Sheerin, Maria Goretti Weldon and Carmen Cruz are continuing 105 years of service by the Sisters of Mercy in the Asheville area.

Although widely known for urgent care centers, the Sisters of Mercy Services Corporation also generously continues to support several ministries and charitable organizations with the proceeds from the sale of St. Joseph's Hospital to Mission Hospitals in 1996.

Among the recipients of their support are a thrift store, a temporary residence and detox center, a home for women and children recovering from abuse and a general contracting business, which builds affordable housing for qualified applicants.

"My hope is that we will be able to continue to serve the wonderful people of western North Carolina for many years to come," said Sister Weldon.

ARE YOU BEING CALLED TO THE HARVEST?

Then he said to His disciples, "The harvest is abundant but the laborers are few; so ask the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers for His harvest." (Mt 9:37)

I am praying that you will join me in responding to our Lord's request for more "laborers" in harvesting the abundant fruit to be found at Belmont Abbey College. Over 125 years ago the Benedictine Monks came south in response to God's call to begin His work in the vineyard of North Carolina.

He is calling you to place your hands upon the same bricks that were formed and put in place by these holy monks so long ago. I am looking for strong, dedicated, Catholic students to help realize our vision of excellence and virtue. Belmont Abbey is your Catholic College and God is calling you to the "harvest."

Pope says first encyclical explores dimensions of love, charity

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI offered a sneak preview of his first encyclical, saying the text would explore the different dimensions of love and charity.

In impromptu remarks at his general audience at the Vatican Jan. 18, the pope announced that the text, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love"), would be released Jan. 25.

"In this encyclical I want to explain the concept of love in its various dimensions. In today's terminology, the meaning of love often is far from that which we know as Christians," he said.

The text, about 50 pages in all, has been described by sources as a spiritual reflection on Christian love and erotic love, the church's work of charity and its mission to announce Christ.

The pope said his goal was to demonstrate that "love is one movement with different dimensions."

"Eros, this gift of love between a man and a woman, comes from the same source of the goodness of the Creator as does the possibility of a love which renounces the self in favor of the other," he said.

Self-sacrificial love can transform erotic love so that "one no longer seeks his own joy and pleasure, but seeks first of all the good of the other person," he said.

He said the transformation of eros into charity was a "journey of purification" that impacts one's immediate family and the larger families of society, church and world.

The pope also alluded to the second part of the encyclical, which examines the church's charitable work in relation to love. He said he makes the point that the personal act of love that comes to humanity from God should be reflected in the church's own actions at an organizational level.

"The church as church, as a community in its institutions, must love," he said.

He said the church's charity, however, is "not just an organization like other philanthropic organizations" but expresses "the more profound act of the personal love God has created in our hearts."

The pope said he considered it providential that the encyclical, which was delayed for weeks, would finally come out on the day he will close the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity.

While not specifically focused on ecumenism, he said, the encyclical's foundation is ecumenical because "God's love and our love is the condition for unity among Christians and for peace in the world."

Vatican sources said the encyclical was delayed by a number of revisions in the text and that translation of the revisions was completed Jan. 17.

One source said an earlier version of the encyclical was circulated to Vatican departments and a small number of theologians last fall, resulting in a significant number of suggested changes. Subsequent editing of the text included wording modifications, new explanatory sections and revision of the conclusion, he said.

The encyclical takes its theme and title from a passage in the First Letter of John, "God is love, and whoever remains in love remains in God and God in him."

The pope says these words clearly express the centrality of the Christian faith, the Christian image of God, and the vision of man and his path.

According to a brief excerpt published by the Italian news agency ANSA, the encyclical warns that in contemporary society the division between erotic love and the self-sacrificing spiritual love proposed by Christianity is resulting in sexual degradation.

The complete text of the encyclical was released to journalists at a press conference Jan. 25.

Prayer can transform drudgery into fulfillment

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Every Dec. 31, I get a double whammy — the end of another calendar year and my own birthday, both of which lead me to take stock of my life in a big way.

Like most people, I make resolutions for improvement within the usual categories of nutrition, work habits, exercise, spiritual practices, etc., all with the best of intentions.

In early February, the noble, high-minded resolve of the new year is tempered by the daily drudgery required to keep those resolutions. Even the most compelling of intentions are barren without what I call "grunt work," meaning the numerous repetitive, tedious and necessary duties I would rather put off or delegate, tasks that by their persistent ordinariness overwhelm me, sap my energy and erode my enthusiasm.

While I would not equate my lot with Job's miserable situation, I can certainly echo some of his sentiments.

In contrast to Job's lament, we read the accounts of the ministries of Jesus in Mark's Gospel and St. Paul's letter to the church at Corinth. In Mark's short passage about Jesus' work of healing, preaching and casting out demons — and it was "work" in the fullest sense of the word — one can almost sense the daily rhythm of relentless activity that from Jesus' human perspective must have been wearisome and draining at times.

(As a mother, I especially could relate to his being pursued despite his attempt to find some quiet!)

St. Paul grasped this aspect of ministry as well, calling his preaching the Gospel an "obligation," embracing a voluntary slavery that required him to be "all things to all people."

However demanding busy their day-to-day work must have been, Paul diligently and unquestionably labored "for the sake of the Gospel," while Jesus clearly viewed his own work as comprising "the purpose for which I came." What makes the difference between "drudgery" done for its own sake and meaningful work done for a higher purpose?

The Gospel passage gives us a clue when it places Jesus' time of prayer between of Jesus' ministerial activities. A life without prayer and reflection can degenerate into a succession of meaningless tasks, restless nights and hopeless days, as Job describes it.

But as Jesus' own example reveals, prayer can transform even drudgery into purpose and fulfillment.

Questions:

What sorts of "drudgery" are you facing right now? In what way can you follow Jesus' example of prayer so that your work becomes more purposeful?

Back in the 'Morning Light'

St. Louis Jesuits liturgical music group back together after 21 years

BY LISA SCHULTE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

OMAHA, Neb. — The St. Louis Jesuits, liturgical music icons from the 1970s, are back together and have released their first album in more than 20 years.

"Morning Light" is the seventh recording for the St. Louis Jesuits — Dan Schutte and Jesuit Fathers Bob Dufford, John Foley and Roc O'Connor — who were known for such songs as "Blest Be the Lord," "Lift Up Your Hearts" and "Sing a New Song."

In the mid 1980s, various assignments moved the men to different parts of the country, and Schutte left the Society of Jesus. These changes made it difficult to record music together, said Father O'Connor, a theology professor at Creighton University in Omaha.

"It just seemed like it was a time for each of us to try something on our own," he said.

Since that time, all four have released successful solo CDs.

"It was a wonderful experience and very nostalgic and heartwarming to record together again," Schutte said. "Beyond the recording, it was just a wonderful experience of spending companionship time together."

The four met up in 2001 at the 25th anniversary celebration of the National Association of Pastoral Musicians in Washington, where they sang Schutte's "City of God." It was the first time in 17 years that they had performed together live.

"For me, it was this experience of consolation, of here we are doing something together again," Father O'Connor said. "There was a feeling of being at home in that experience of singing together."

A year later they met in San Francisco to discuss the possibility of making a new CD together, which was something they had avoided in the past.

"We had been asked by the publishers before to put some music out together and we said no, there's no reason to do it other than someone would make money on it," Father O'Connor said. "Our sense was that we're fine going on the way we are."

The men talked and prayed about it for three days and decided the time was right.

"The thing that came to us most often is that this is an act of hope, and it's not hope that the good old days will return, but it's hope that the continued reform of the liturgy can allow us a deeper integration of transcendent and imminent and a deepening of our experience of God and community in liturgical prayer," Father O'Connor said.

When the men gathered again, this time in Portland, Ore., each brought songs he had written himself and they recorded 20 pieces. Only 12 were chosen for this CD.

Tim Manion, one of the original St. Louis Jesuits, joined with the four to sing for some of the recordings.

Fans of the St. Louis Jesuits' music will find comfort in the songs on "Morning Light" as its sound is much the same as their earlier sound. But there are some challenging and surprising pieces included as well, arising "from life experience and the ups and downs that we've all faced," Father O'Connor said.

Although pleased with the CD, Schutte, composer in residence at the University of San Francisco, said it was "a little bit scary" to release an album together after 20 years.

"You put a lot of love and labor into the songs and you may like them, but who knows if anyone else is going to," he said. "I hope people find them useful in worship and prayer."

In the spring, Fathers O'Connor, Foley and Dufford and Schutte will do four live performances in Washington, St. Louis, Chicago and Anaheim, Calif. The group hasn't done any public performances together in nearly 20 years.

"It's our little reunion tour," Schutte said. "It's going to be a wonderful shot in the arm for many people."

The sixth-grade class focused on ethnic diversity and tolerance, and for homework they had to prepare and bring in a food dish from their family's ethnic background. They then presented their dishes and discussed their significance in their families' history. The food ranged from English fare — such as Joey's butter tarts — to Ethiopian pastry to Korean dumplings.

From the archives

To-do lists, pay stubs: Archive details St. Peter's construction

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — For every sack of cement that was purchased, for every block of stone quarried and hauled to Rome, architects in charge of building St. Peter's Basilica filled out and filed away receipts and penned detailed notations in thick, bound ledgers.

Even every artisan and worker hired, every on-the-job accident, lawsuit and progress report on the construction of the world's largest church were recorded and stored away in a little-known — but priceless — Vatican archive.

The archives of the Fabbrica di San Pietro, the Vatican office responsible for the basilica's construction matters, certainly do not carry the same recognition as the Vatican Secret Archives, perhaps because their contents may seem more mundane.

Instead of 20th-century Vatican intrigue, one is more likely to find a Renaissance master's to-do list, crinkled pay stubs and requests addressed to patrons holding the purse strings.

More than 10,000 pieces of parchment, documents and scraps of paper are catalogued and tucked away in fat, hardcover volumes. Each volume, bursting with notes and folios, stands in unlocked glass cabinets that line the archive's octagon-shaped rooms.

The rooms are located on an upper floor near the back of the basilica, overlooking the organ pipes.

From inside St. Peter's Basilica, authorized guests can access the climate-controlled collection by going through a door underneath the massive monument to Pope Alexander VII.

"The archives preserve the entire history of the basilica," said Simona Turriziani, one of the four people who work cataloging and caring for the Fabbrica's archives.

"It's not a huge archive, but it's incredibly rich because all the important architects of the 1500s to the 1600s came through (the basilica), because it was the most important construction site at the time," she said.

Donato Bramante, Raphael, Michelangelo Buonarroti, Carlo Maderno, Giovanni Bernini and Francesco Borromini's handwritten notes, instructions, reports and requests are all housed there.

These Renaissance and Baroque artists each had a hand in the design or building of St. Peter's Basilica, whose construction began 500 years ago on April 18, 1506.

That day Pope Julius II set the first cornerstone of the new basilica. He mobilized the resources and the artists to finally do what popes before him had been concerned about — saving from collapse the ancient basilica built at the time of Constantine.

But Pope Julius wanted a large, grandiose basilica to replace the smaller, deteriorating original that sat atop the underground tomb of St. Peter.

Construction on the new church lasted more than 100 years. The project was not only enormous, but sometimes work was stalled as earlier plans and designs were scrapped or revised by successive architects.

Antonio da San Gallo the Younger, for example, wrote a letter to the pope criticizing what Raphael, San Gallo's predecessor, had done.

Michelangelo later tossed out San Gallo's own blueprint for the basilica, saying the design was too elaborate and created too many dark, winding corridors.

Michelangelo told his papal patron that he could create a more luminous and far simpler basilica in less time, and his design was accepted.

Michelangelo, like many people involved in the project, never lived to see the church completed in 1620. But he dedicated almost 20 years of his life, 1546-1564, to being head architect.

Perhaps the meticulous notes were considered to be humdrum information by bookkeepers at the time, but today scholars find the details fascinating.

Turriziani said the Vatican was preparing to mark the basilica's 500th anniversary this year with a number of unconfirmed events and celebrations.

She emphasized the basilica's collection was still "a living archive" and that everything sent to the Fabbrica was still recorded and preserved.

Even the letter the Vatican press office sent requesting permission for Vatican journalists to visit the archives in late December "has been catalogued and filed away," she said.

Thus the paper trail continues as seemingly more mundane materials of today are safely tucked away with ancient parchments to stand the test of time.

Facing evil

Horrid crimes can test, affirm our faith

A bottle of evil was opened in a well-to-do suburban neighborhood in Charlotte recently.

Five-year-old identical twins Samantha and Tessara Crespi were stabbed to death. David Crespi, the girls' father, who called police to report the crime, was charged with their first-degree murder the same day.

Crespi is a senior vice-president of Wachovia, a position that indicates success in life. Neighbors describe the family as average and happy with no hint that anything so horrific was on its horizon.

Crespi is also an active member of St. Matthew Church and so, within minutes of the news media learning of the story, I started to receive telephone calls. Reporters wanted to know how they might be able to contact the pastor? Would TV crews be allowed into the church for the funeral? Could I provide a photograph of the family from a church directory?

The questions may seem intrusive, even vulture-like, but that is what reporters do and most weren't offended or surprised when I answered their questions: no, no and no.

Reporters and the rest of us deal with horrific events like this on two levels. First we want to know what happened and then we want to understand why.

In the case of Crespi, subsequent news reports quoted family members as saying he had been treated for depression and had recently changed his medication so he could cope with insomnia. The inference is obvious — a pharmaceutical cocktail somehow caused an unstable adult to commit a nearly unspeakable crime against a pair of innocent pre-schoolers.

Other details may change completely the context of that initial report, but all of the particulars serve the same purpose. They help us comprehend the horrid potentials of the human mind.

But the facts will only take us so far in coming to grips with the idea of a parent killing his children. We long for a more complete understanding. As people of faith, it can be very difficult to understand God's plan when this kind of suffering is in our midst.

Judy Williams of Charlotte knows first hand of the nightmare that family members go through when a child is murdered. Her goddaughter, Shawna Hawk, was strangled and drowned by a serial killer in 1993. For her, the only explanation for the murder of a child is the presence of evil in the world.

"The devil is very busy," she said. "The demons aren't gone."

Williams said she was lost in grief and anger when Shawna died. Part of her

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

response to the tragedy was the founding of MOMO, Mothers of Murdered Offspring, a support and education group for the families of murdered children.

She offers two candles for those who are stumbling through the darkness in trying to understand something as brutal as the murder of a child:

"You have to realize that the devil is the real enemy. If you lose sight of that you could become his victim. Whenever you entertain thoughts of evil, you have to rebuke them quickly."

That's fine for avoiding evil, but what about those times when evil pushes its way onto the center stage of a family's life? The Crespi twins' mother and their siblings are victims of this crime also.

Williams' advice is to turn to the Lord in what she calls "trusting time."

"We don't understand what God's purpose is, but we have to believe that he does have one," she said. "We serve a loving God who does not get pleasure out of our pain. We must stay close to him."

In the face of such evil, what else can we do?

How does a person become cheerful?

Although I tried to avoid it, I couldn't stop staring at the man across from me on the Metro.

What first caught my eye was the way he wore his fedora. The man's olive skin, white hair and demeanor fit the image of a mafioso boss par excellence.

I looked into his eyes and was amazed how they danced with enthusiasm. He delighted in everything he looked at. He may have been in his early 70s, but you wouldn't know it because he was like a child experiencing life around him for the first time.

I always have wondered what the biblical concept "cheerfulness of heart" might look like in a person. As I observed

Humanity can end hatred by following God's law with love, pope says

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — By following God's law with sincerity and love, humanity can end the hatred, conflicts and warfare plaguing the world and usher in a new era of justice and peace, Pope Benedict XVI said in his weekly general audience.

"Only the people who know God and defend spiritual and moral values" can reach real peace, "bring in the strength of peace for the world and to other peoples," he said in remarks apart from the text.

Speaking to nearly 8,000 pilgrims gathered in the Vatican's Paul VI hall, the pope dedicated his Jan. 25 catechesis to the last half of Psalm 144.

The psalmist paints a picture of the coming of a "new, joyous world," marked by peace, prosperity and families blessed with children, fertile flocks and fields.

These same images of abundance and serenity "can also become a sign for us of the birth of a more just society," the pope said.

But this new world of harmony and peace can only come if people work together with God, "under the guidance of the Messiah, Christ," he said.

Only when people follow the plan and laws of "the God of love and justice" can they "implement this project of harmony and peace, ending the destructive action of hatred, violence, war," the pope said.

He said St. Augustine interpreted the 10-stringed harp represented in the psalm as standing for the Ten Commandments. The psalmist sought to sing "a new song" to God with his harp, the pope said, but only when the faithful sing "from the heart" and with love will their song to God be "sung well."

The Pope Speaks

POPE

In other words, being in harmony with God comes about when the person lives out the commandments with a heart full of love.

"The love that unites us with Christ's feelings is the real 'new song' of the new man who is fit to also create a new world," the pope said.

The Jan. 25 general audience fell on the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul and at the end of the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity.

Pope Benedict said the week highlighted the need to "constantly pray to the Lord for the great gift of full unity among all Christ's disciples."

Prayer, he said, was a concrete way to make sure the fruits coming out of the common task of ecumenism were "more sincere and abundant."

In his greetings in various languages to groups of pilgrims in the audience hall, the pope greeted Italian soccer referees. He asked that they help foster "proper human and spiritual education," which creates "more mature and responsible people."

The Italian referees later presented the pope with a navy blue warm-up jacket with the name Ratzinger printed on the back collar. Pope Benedict, whose family name is Ratzinger, held the jacket against his chest, checking its measurements.

this man's joyfulness, I thought, "This is what you are looking for: a person at peace with himself and the world, and who hasn't lost enthusiasm about life. His cheerful enthusiasm is so natural!"

How, I wondered, does one cultivate a penchant for joy?

If we delved into this man's life, no doubt we would find that his heart was broken often. Perhaps his wife died or his children met with trouble. It could be that he suffers from an illness. Yet his face and eyes weren't dimmed.

In the midst of crises, had he, like so many wise elders, come to accept life as it is rather than fighting it and crying "poor me" every time it wasn't to his liking?

Accepting life's realities makes it much easier to endure the hardships. Instead of running from deep-seated anxieties, we face them squarely and in doing so are in possession of ourselves.

I also wonder if cheerfulness of heart is the result of cultivating the "sacrament of the moment," which we fully enter into by God's grace. Once so focused, distractions are minimized, leaving room for the peace that seems so basic to a cheerful heart.

"Cheerfulness," in Greek, means God's spirit coursing through a person. When we become one with God, we cannot but be filled with God's joy.

The next time you need cheering up, look around you for people who exude cheerfulness of heart. You may just find their secret and join them.

Talking about integrity at work

Business execs share words of wisdom

It just happened to be a day when the Jack Abramoff scandal dominated the headlines and the fraud trial of Ken Lay and his Enron associates was about to begin.

I found myself in a conversation about integrity with a group of veteran business executives. These men and women had gathered, as they do once every month, to discuss the relevance of their faith to their business and professional responsibilities.

Integrity is a big item with them.

I found myself jotting down some of their remarks and want to post them here. They are applicable to adult believers in all walks of life.

They are particularly applicable to those who have to negotiate their way through what is now commonly called a "culture of corruption" in the world of work.

"A person of integrity is a person who displays wisdom qualities," said one of the participants, "and we would be wise to spend more time these days talking about ethics." And so we did.

The conversation ranged from expense accounts and mileage allowances ("If you can't make your quota, drive your car," was advice one salesman recalled receiving as a young trainee) to the folly of establishing a department of ethics in a big corporation if there is no ethical "tone at the top."

The ethics conversation has to begin at the dinner table long before you get your first job, one CEO asserted.

"I can still hear my father saying at the table, 'You've got to do the harder right rather than the easier wrong.' Nothing I ever learned in the classroom has stuck with me the way those dinner table discussions have," he said.

Integrity requires openness, all agreed, but presence too.

Being "present to the moment" is important, and even more important is having the courage and wisdom to speak up.

"How many times do you close the door, sit down and talk with your peers in the executive suite about whether you are crossing the line?" asked another CEO.

"The corporation that has integrity will have managers talking to one another about ethical issues. There has to be a trust among them and a willingness to say 'I don't know' without any fear of that being mistaken for a sign of weakness, not wisdom," he said.

Picking up on that, another remarked, "You want to be in an environment where, if you're confused, you feel free to disclose your confusion to colleagues you trust."

With reference to the "culture of corruption," another said: "Our culture is dominated by profit. It also has a focus on youth, not on wisdom. The culture is the water we swim in."

"Money is the complicating factor in all of this," said another, "and it has not taken me long to notice that there is not a huge correlation between money and happiness."

One of the older participants said: "A wisdom ingredient is the ability to change one's mind. It can only exist in an environment where you can talk things over with others. Wisdom is when you realize you don't know it all."

"It's astonishing how often you hear someone say, 'Can I be honest with you?' and I say to myself, 'I had been assuming all along that you were being honest with me.'"

"If you can't legislate morality," and I don't think you can, said a young accountant, "then we simply have to have a principle-based integrity culture, a culture where all the 'swimmers' have first internalized principles that point them in the right direction."

State of the world's poor

Making a Difference

TONY MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

SMALL EFFORT CAN MAKE BIG DIFFERENCE

The new year is not shaping up to be a happy one for hundreds of millions of the world's poorest children. In fact, the U.N. Children's Fund (www.unicef.org) reports that the situation is truly desperate.

According to their highly respected annual report titled "The State of the World's Children 2006," millions of excluded and invisible children make their way through life impoverished, abandoned, uneducated, malnourished, discriminated against, neglected and vulnerable.

In the world's poorest countries:

—One in every six children dies before age 5.

—One in every three children under 5 is moderately or severely underweight.

—One in every two girls is not in primary school.

—One in every four children is not immunized against measles, which kills more than 500,000 children every year.

Why do we allow so many of the world's children to suffer and die?

The United States has the resources to end domestic and global childhood poverty and hunger. However, as individuals and as a government, we often throw crumbs to the poor.

Speaking from New York in 1979, Pope John Paul II said: "The poor of the United States and of the world are your brothers and sisters in Christ. Never be content to leave them just the crumbs of the feast."

"Take of your substance, and not just of your abundance, in order to help them. Treat them like guests at your family table."

You can invite the poor — especially poor children — to your family table by e-mailing or calling your congressman and two U.S. senators (Capitol switchboard: 202-224-3121), urging them to double the funding in fiscal year 2007 for the McGovern-Dole School Feeding Program.

This wonderful project enables very poor schools in the developing world to provide a nutritious meal for each student. Doubling the funding would provide food and education for an additional 2 million children.

Also, urge your congressional delegation to increase the Title II Food for Peace program to $2 billion for 2007.

With just a little effort and pennies a day, we can help some of the world's poorest children enjoy a good meal, receive an education and experience what it means to be a child!

The permanence of holy orders

Q. I was taught during my Catholic education that the sacrament of holy orders was a lifetime commitment — marriage to God or to the church.

Why then are Catholics excommunicated and forbidden to receive the Eucharist if they were legally married in the church, then divorce and remarry, when an ordained priest may leave the priesthood, receive the sacrament of marriage, is not excommunicated and is permitted to receive the sacraments?

I believe the church had no objection to divorce and remarriage prior to the 13th and 14th centuries. (New York)

A. First, married Catholics who divorce and remarry another person outside the church should not receive the sacraments until their new marriage is validated in the church.

Contrary to what many still believe, however, they are not formally excommunicated, are still part of the church and are encouraged to participate in its life in all other ways.

The sacramental theology of marriage differs from that of holy orders. We believe that marriage is in itself a commitment for life between the two spouses, that this is an ordinance of God, what he intended the marriage covenant to be. There's plenty of biblical witness to that truth.

It's true that, according to Catholic theology and doctrine, an ordained priest remains an ordained priest for life. In a metaphor that attempts to articulate that truth, it often is said that ordination creates an "indelible mark" on the individual, just as baptism creates an indelible character on those who receive that sacrament.

The discipline with which the church determines how and when and where the priest will publicly exercise that sacrament, however, was not established by Christ. The church has varied its regulations and policies on this subject often through the centuries.

Among those policies today, determined generally by canon law, is that a priest may be removed from active ministry, meaning that he cannot exercise his pastoral responsibilities.

This removal may be on his own initiative, which may sooner or later be accepted by the church (for example, by laicization), or it may be on the initiative of the bishop or other responsible authority.

In that sense, once a priest always a priest. Even one who has left the priesthood and perhaps entered a marriage retains until death the ability in the church to minister the sacraments, though he may not lawfully exercise that responsibility except for people in critical emergencies or danger of death.

These exceptions are provided since the church in such matters has always held to the principle that the good of souls, the spiritual needs of people, come first.

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN
DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

The metaphor that a priest, particularly a bishop, is "married" to the church, or to his diocese, is an ancient one in Christianity. But like all metaphors, it cannot be stretched beyond its intended meaning.

It helps to convey the idea that a commitment somewhat like marriage binds a priest to the church and to the people he serves. The similarity does not, however, define the nature and meaning of that priestly commitment.

It is not correct that the church once had no objection to divorce. Its laws and practices concerning when and how marriages take place, and its theology of the sacrament developed often through the centuries.

For instance, it approved in particular cases the dissolution of a marriage between a Christian and a non-Christian (the Pauline Privilege). At no time, however, did it not teach the lifetime character of the marriage covenant.

Shooting for sainthood

Founder of Indiana Catholic home one step closer to sainthood

BY STEVE EUVINO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

EAST CHICAGO, Ind. — The staff at St. Joseph's Carmelite Home for Girls has certainly witnessed growth in recent years, adding facilities for emergency care and a center for infants and toddlers. The staff is now awaiting news of a possible church honor for the home's founder.

Pope Benedict XVI signed decrees Dec. 19 recognizing miracles attributed to the intercession of nine individuals. Among those now ready for beatification is Mother Anna Maria Tauscher, also known as Mother Maria Teresa of St. Joseph.

The German-born founder of the Carmelite Sisters of the Divine Heart of Jesus also founded St. Joseph's Carmelite Home for Girls in East Chicago — one of a number of facilities still in operation that she founded on a trip to America.

"We're very, very happy. We've been waiting, we planned, and we were hoping for it," said Carmelite Sister Maria Giuseppe Moxley, administrator at the home and provincial superior for her order.

"Some of our older sisters knew her, and a couple still remember her," said Sister Moxley.

Born in 1855 in a part of Germany that is now Poland, Mother Anna Maria went on to establish homes throughout Europe. The Carmelite Sisters have since opened children's homes in Canada, Nicaragua, Venezuela, Mexico, Brazil, Africa, Iceland and Russia.

"Mother loved children, and she worked to found homes for the homeless," Sister Maria Giuseppe said.

in the canonization process. It takes place after a person's life, writings and teachings have been examined and found to contain nothing contrary to church teachings or to the demands of Christian perfection, and also after a miracle attributed to the intercession of the sainthood candidate has been recognized.

Sister Moxley said the beatification will be May 13 in the Netherlands. The local bishop will beatify Mother Anna Maria Tauscher at that time, and Sister Maria Giuseppe said she'll be there.

"She was a great, great woman," Sister Maria Giuseppe said. "She had a deep, deep holiness, and she had complete and total trust in God."

Recalling that Mother Anna Maria faced plenty of opposition, Sister Moxley said her order's founder displayed "tenacity and the stamina to persevere. She got (opposition) from all sides. But she was faithful and persevering and had so much strength of character and determination."

After joining the Catholic Church at age 30, Anna Maria Tauscher van Bosch wanted to give herself totally to God as a religious and began visiting convents, with particular interest in the Carmelites.

However, she wanted to establish her own order of Carmelites, and she faced opposition from clergy who could not understand her need for a new order.

The Vatican in 1898 did approve the Carmelite Sisters of the Divine Heart of Jesus. Though based on the cloistered rule of St. Teresa of Avila, these sisters combined that rule with action.

"That was Mother's big thing — she wanted to be active, not cloistered," Sister Maria Giuseppe said.

After opening her first novitiate in Sittard, Netherlands, Mother Anna Maria began opening homes in Europe, beginning with St. Joseph's Home in Berlin in 1896. She worked in Europe until 1912, when she came to East Chicago and purchased two small frame houses that became the nucleus for the current blocklong facility.

The home, officially founded in 1913, now ranks as the oldest home she started that is still in operation in this country. The Carmelite Home originally accepted both male and female orphans.

Mother Anna Maria, who stayed in the U.S. about eight years, left East Chicago for San Antonio and other parts of this country. Her Carmelite congregation today has three provinces in America.

After returning to Europe, Mother Anna Maria continued opening children's homes — 58 during her lifetime. She died in Sittard Sept. 20, 1938.

As Catholics, we have been touched by the love of Christ. It is our obligation to respond with gratitude.

And every day across the Diocese of Charlotte, people and ministries share that gift of love with others — by protecting the unborn, welcoming the stranger, answering a vocational call.

INSPIRED BY ILLNESS

Mercy Sister Peggy Mahoney, director of planned giving for the Diocese of Wilmington, Del., walks in Rockford Park in October 2005. Sister Mahoney was diagnosed in 2003 with polymyositis, a disease marked by weakness and inflammation of the muscles. She said the illness has given her a new outlook on her life and faith.

Nun's rare illness spurs new approach to life

WILMINGTON, Del. (CNS) — Most people would not see a chronic, progressive, debilitating disease as a blessing, or call themselves "one of the lucky ones."

Mercy Sister Peggy Mahoney must not be most people.

Sister Mahoney, director of planned giving for the Wilmington Diocese, was diagnosed in 2003 with polymyositis, an autoimmune disease marked by weakness and inflammation of the muscles.

"I have aches, discomfort, periods of weakness," she said.

Sister Mahoney feels she is lucky because she has been "forced to find that balance" in life that so many people talk about but rarely achieve.

"I've had to draw back a little bit. I've learned to say no sometimes," she said. "You have to re-evaluate everything. And that's hard."

That doesn't mean she isn't busy. In her job, Sister Mahoney, 59, talks to people about providing for the church in their wills or through donations.

Polymyositis is rarely fatal but it can be debilitating and even temporary remission is rare. Only 30,000-50,000 people in the United States have it, which makes it hard to get funding for research and drugs that might combat its effects. There is no definitive cause for the illness.

"I thought, 'Oh my God, my life is going to change.' And it did change," she said — in some ways for the better. She started eating better and exercising more to deter the atrophy of her muscles, but she may have to start using a cane or a wheelchair at some point.

"With a chronic illness, it never gets better, it never goes away," she said.

Sister Mahoney views her illness through the lens of faith.

"I was mad at God for a little while," she said, but she realized God did not cause her to develop the illness and doesn't "sit up there" wondering how he can make someone's life miserable.

Now she wonders what God wants her to learn from her illness.

"This for me is an opportunity to become more aware of life around me. What is it that I'm supposed to be learning? There's something here to learn about life, about people, about God," she said.

She is determined not to let the disease take over her life or define who she is. Though the illness "shapes" her, she said, "I am not my disease."

Alito confirmed as court's fifth Catholic justice

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Samuel Alito Jr. was confirmed to the Supreme Court Jan. 31, becoming the fifth Catholic on the nine-member court.

Alito watched the 58-42 Senate vote from the White House, where he was to be sworn in at a private ceremony in time to appear at the Capitol for the State of the Union address by President George W. Bush that evening.

A second, ceremonial swearing-in was scheduled for Feb. 1 at the White House.

Alito, 55, was nominated in October to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

He had been a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia since 1990. Earlier, he was U.S. attorney for New Jersey and served on the staff at the Justice Department during the Reagan administration.

A native of Trenton, N.J., Alito attended Princeton University as an undergraduate and received his law degree from Yale University in 1975.

Alito was actually the third nominee to replace O'Connor. After she announced her retirement last summer, Bush nominated Judge John Roberts for the seat. When Chief Justice William Rehnquist died in September, Roberts was renominated to the chief's position.

Roberts was confirmed and took his seat as chief justice in time for the court's opening session in October.

Bush's next nominee, White House counsel Harriet Miers, withdrew her nomination after a few weeks amid criticism from Bush's political supporters.

Alito joins four other Catholics on the bench, making it the first time Catholics have held a majority on the Court. Besides Roberts, the other Catholics are Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas.

Pope prays that Olympics show friendship amid world's conflicts, tensions

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI prayed that the upcoming Winter Olympics would show that friendship and mutual understanding were possible even at a time when humanity is experiencing so much conflict and tension.

He also asked that the games, which will be held in Turin, Italy, Feb. 10-26, be a spiritual catalyst for people of faith and give them "an opportune occasion to reflect" on how the lessons derived from sport can carry over to "spiritual exercise."

The pope's written message was addressed to Cardinal Severino Poletto of Turin to mark the upcoming opening of the XX Olympic Winter Games. Though the message was dated Nov. 29, 2005, the Vatican released the text Jan. 21.

The pope told the cardinal he was praying that the Olympic events "would be for all an eloquent sign of friendship and contribute to strengthening mutual understanding between people."

The pope asked how it was possible "to not recognize how much this is needed in our age that witnesses humanity marked by not a little tension and yearning to build a future of authentic peace."

Christ is "the light of the world that illuminates humanity in all of its dimensions, including sport," he said.

Even sport needs "to be illuminated by God through Christ so that the values it expresses may be purified and elevated both on a personal and collective level," the pope said.

Religious orders give church, world models of charity, says pope

VATICAN CITY — Citing his recent encyclical, Pope Benedict XVI said religious orders through the centuries have given the church and the world models of Christian charity.

The pope made the remarks at his Sunday blessing Jan. 29, as he looked forward to the celebration of the World Day for Consecrated Life, which is observed in Rome on the feast of the Presentation of the Lord Feb. 2.

The pope noted that in his first encyclical, titled "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love"), he had written about the important witness of charity given by the saints, from the earliest days of the church to modern times.

Many of the saints, he said, were members of religious orders, including figures like St. Thomas Aquinas, the Dominican theologian; St. John Bosco, the Salesian who worked with young people; and St. Angela Merici, who founded the Ursulines and launched its teaching mission.

Among the saints devoted to charity, the pope named Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta, whose Missionaries of Charity work with the poor around the world.

"In truth, the entire history of the church is a history of holiness, animated by the unique love that has its source in God," he said.

"In fact, only supernatural charity, like that which flows continually from the heart of Christ, can explain the exceptional flowering down through the centuries of male and female religious orders and institutes, and other forms of consecrated life," the pope said.

He said it was important for the modern church to remember the importance of consecrated life as "the expression and the school of charity."

Continuing a tradition of Pope John Paul II, Pope Benedict was to say Mass Feb. 2 in St. Peter's Basilica to mark the World Day for Consecrated Life. Thousands of religious living in Rome were expected to attend the liturgy.

The conference announced a candle-light vigil that night outside a building where an anti-immigration meeting was to take place.

Last May, the U.S. bishops and other Catholic organizations launched the national Justice for Immigrants Campaign of the Catholic Campaign for Immigration Reform. Its goals are: educating Catholics and others about the benefits of immigration to both the immigrants themselves and to the United States; strengthening public opinion about immigration's positive contributions; advocating just immigration laws that promote legal status and legal pathways for migrant worker and their families; and organizing Catholic legal service networks to help immigrants gain access to the benefits of reforms.

Knights donations help mentally challenged

MOORESVILLE — Knights of Columbus Council 7406 at St. Therese Church in Mooresville recently donated $6,975 to local schools and agencies working with the mentally challenged of Mooresville and Iredell County.

The funds were donated to Mooresville High School, Park View Elementary School and LifeSpan Jan. 24. All of the money was earmarked for projects to help in the classrooms or enrichment programs of those who are educationally challenged.

According to Ken Fusaro, the council's grand knight, the funds were raised through the Knights' Operation LAMB collections.

The word "LAMB" (Least Among My Brethren) is taken from St. Matthew's Gospel, in which Jesus said, "Whatsoever you do to the least among my brethren, you do unto me." The program is conducted by councils throughout the United States to help the mentally challenged.

Contributions to Council 7406's campaign were collected during its annual "Tootsie Roll Campaign" held on two weekends outside various stores in Mooresville in September and October 2005. More than 9,000 Tootsie Rolls were given away as "thank yous" to contributors.

"We couldn't even begin something of this nature without the citizens' support," said Mark Daly, director of this year's Operation LAMB.

Service weekend open to Catholic college students

BELMONT — Is it possible to fall in love in a day? Some college students think so.

Through the Give Your Heart Away community service weekend, the students have learned the deeper meaning of love by helping the less fortunate.

The annual event, this year taking place in Belmont Feb. 10-12, is sponsored by diocesan Catholic campus ministry.

For the past two years, more than 100 college students in the Diocese of Charlotte have volunteered at various ministries in Charlotte and Belmont, answering the call from U.S. bishops to put Catholic social teaching into action.

At previous events, students painted houses for Habitat for Humanity and rooms at Catherine's House for homeless women and children; visited homeless at Urban Ministry Center and AIDS victims at House of Mercy; and planned a Valentine's Day party at Holy Angels for children and adults with mental retardation.

Initiated by Catholic campus ministers in the diocese, Give Your Heart Away provides an opportunity for Catholic college students to join together in service, study, prayer reflection and fun.

This year's service weekend will offer even more opportunities, including landscaping a Habitat for Humanity house, sorting donations for Room at the Inn and visiting with retired nuns at the Sisters of Mercy motherhouse.

Afterward, students will engage in small group reflection to consider service and justice in the context of Scripture and Catholic social teachings.

The weekend concludes with a panel of previous volunteers and religious who will address ways in which the students can continue service and justice work beyond their college experiences.

Catholic Campus Ministry is one of the ministries supported by contributions to the Diocesan Support Appeal.

FROM THE COVER

Pope calls for deeper understanding of love issued Jan. 25 in seven languages. Addressed to all Catholics, it was divided into two sections, one on the meaning of love in salvation history, the other on the practice of love by the church.

The pope said his aim was to "speak of the love which God lavishes upon us and which we in return must share with others." The two aspects, personal love and the practice of charity, are profoundly interconnected, he said.

The encyclical begins with a phrase from the First Letter of John: "God is love, and he who abides in love abides in God, and God abides in him."

The pope said the line expresses the heart of the Christian faith, which understands the creator as a loving God and which sees Christ's death as the ultimate sign of God's love for man.

In today's world, however, the term "love" is frequently used and misused, he said. Most commonly, it is understood as representing "eros," the erotic love between a man and a woman.

The church, from its earliest days, proposed a new vision of self-sacrificial love expressed in the word "agape," he said.

In modern society, he said, it has become clear that eros itself has been exalted and the human body debased.

"Eros, reduced to pure 'sex,' has become a commodity, a mere 'thing' to be bought and sold, or rather, man himself becomes a commodity. This is hardly man's great 'yes' to the body," said the pope.

"On the contrary, he now considers his body and his sexuality as the purely material part of himself, to be used and exploited at will," he said.

Properly understood, he said, eros leads a man and woman to marriage, a bond that is exclusive, and therefore monogamous, as well as permanent.

While it is true that the happiness of eros can give people a "foretaste of the divine," eros needs to be disciplined and purified if it is to provide more than fleeting pleasure, the pope said.

The solution is to rediscover a balance between the ecstasy of eros and the unselfish love of agape, he said.

The key to regaining this balance, he said, lies in a personal relationship with God and an understanding of the sacrificial love of Jesus Christ. He said Christ gives the ultimate lesson in "love of neighbor," which means: "I love even the person whom I do not like or even know."

"If I have no contact whatsoever with God in my life, then I cannot see in the other anything more than the other, and I am incapable of seeing in him the image of God," the pope said. "But if in my life I fail completely to heed others, solely out of a desire to be 'devout' and to perform my 'religious duties,' then my relationship with God will also grow arid."

The second half of the encyclical

Pope Benedict XVI signs his first encyclical, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love"), in his private library at the Vatican Jan. 23. Archbishop Leonardo Sandri, assistant papal secretary of state, is at his left.

makes two main points:

— As a community, the church must practice love through works of charity and attend to people's sufferings and needs, including material needs.

— The church's action stems from its spiritual mission and must never be undertaken as part of a political or ideological agenda.

The pope said there was a connection between the commitment to justice and the ministry of charity, but also important distinctions. Building a just social and civil order is an essential political task to which the church contributes through its social doctrine, but it "cannot be the church's immediate responsibility," he said.

"A just society must be the achievement of politics, not of the church," he added. "The church cannot and must not take upon herself the political battle to bring about the most just society possible. She cannot and must not replace the state."

"Yet at the same time she cannot and must not remain on the sidelines in the fight for justice," he said.

The church's role is to make the rational arguments for justice and awaken the spiritual energy needed for the sacrifices that justice requires, he said.

"Christian charitable activity ... is not a means of changing the world ideologically, and it is not at the service of worldly stratagems, but it is a way of making present here and now the love which man always needs," he said.

The pope examined and rejected the Marxist arguments that the poor "do not need charity but justice," and that charity is merely a means of preserving a status quo of economic injustice.

He said the church must help the needy wherever they are found, and charity will always be necessary, even in the most just society.

In any case, he said, it is an illusion to think that the state can provide for all needs and fully resolve every problem.

"We do not need a state which regulates and controls everything," but a state that supports initiatives arising from different social forces, he said. The church is one of those forces, he said.

The pope said that those working for Catholic charitable organizations need to be witnesses of the faith as well as professionally competent in humanitarian affairs.

The pope said that prayer should not be forgotten as the church tries to alleviate the immense needs around the world.

"People who pray are not wasting their time, even though the situation appears desperate and seems to call for action alone. Piety does not undermine the struggle against the poverty of our neighbors, however extreme," he said.

MARCH FOR LIFE

Many from diocese march for life religion teacher Frank Delamere, who has organized the school's participation for the last 10 years.

"I believe it to be one of the most educational trips we offer at Charlotte Catholic," said teacher Suzanne Albertson, who has attended the march four times.

"The students get ... a glimpse of the universal nature of the Catholic Church," she said. "They walk, not only among teens from other states, but also with clergy and religious orders they have heard of yet seldom congregate and pray with for a common cause."

Before the march, students and others from North Carolina attended a Mass celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception Jan. 23. The massive basilica was so crowded that many participants had to sit in the aisles and doorways.

During his homily, Bishop Jugis asked, "Why does our society fail to welcome the little child?"

His answer — our society is lacking in love. Only when we as a nation begin to live and really believe in the primacy of love, he said, would a culture of love be established.

Bishop Jugis encouraged the congregation to see the Eucharist as divine assistance enabling Catholics to bear witness to the primacy of love, which by necessity upholds humanity's right to life.

The march began at the National Mall, where Nellie Gray, March for Life organizer, selected a group from Iowa to carry the huge banner at the front of the marchers because of their strong support over the years.

"One of the impressions the march makes on me every time I attend is just how diverse this powerful movement to promote human life is," said Joe Purello, director of the Office of Justice and Peace for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"There are many young people, elderly people, people in wheelchairs and people of all ethnic backgrounds — all walking and praying for the protection of human life," he said.

Purello said that far too many citizens go about their daily lives "numb" to the staggering number of unborn human beings that "have been lost to abortion since 1973 — at least 45 million by most estimates."

"Certainly the pain of that terrible statistic cannot be forgotten, and that pain was on the faces of many in Washington," he said. "Yet I could also sense a mood of hope on the faces of those who came to pray together and to rally to support human life."

"It is a hope born in the realization that truth wins out in the end and that, eventually, our nation will see abortion for what it truly is — a terrible choice that ends a human life," said Purello.

The march ended at the Supreme Court building, where nearly two-dozen young people stood with red tape that read "Life" over their mouths. A few angry opponents chanted "Roe v. Wade is here to stay."

Franciscan Sister Clare Matthiass from New York has attended the march for 15 years and has watched the increase in the number of young participants.

"The youth recognize that life is worth living," she said.

Sister Matthiass believes many youths realize they would not exist if their parents had chosen to have an abortion.

"They are expressing sadness at the loss of their own generation to abortion," she said.

"It's just such an amazing feeling to be surrounded by people who are as passionate on the pro-life issue as you are," said Shannon Minick, a Charlotte Catholic sophomore who participated in the march for her second year.

"I felt like I was a part of something special; like I was really making a difference and voicing my opinion on a serious matter," said senior Cameron Bevington, who participated for the first time.

Junior Erin Galis, president of Charlotte Catholic's Voice for Life group, participated in the march for the third time.

"It is nice to know when you are marching that everyone around you supports your cause of protecting the dignity of life," she said.

Though media coverage of the march was slim, many marchers believe they were making a difference for their society.

"I am determined, like the rest of those who participated in the march, to end the disrespect for life that is occurring all around us," said Galis.

DIOCESAN SUPPORT APPEAL

Catechist looks forward to permanent diaconate

Hmong ministry expands through Diocesan Support Appeal

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Historically, when a great many Catholics emigrated from abroad, priests from those countries also immigrated to the United States to serve the Catholics of those nations.

Italian immigrants could give their confessions in their native language. German Catholics could recite their wedding vows before a German-speaking priest.

The Hmong haven't been as fortunate. According to the U.S. bishops' Web site, one Hmong priest and eight Hmong permanent deacons serve in the entire United States.

During the Vietnam War, tens of thousands of Hmong provided ground support for U.S. troops in the then-secret wars in Laos. In the mid-1970s, the Hmong began to immigrate to the United States as refugees.

The 2000 U.S. Census lists the Hmong population at 169,428, but figures given to Hmong National Development, Inc. by local Hmong leaders lists the population as high as 283,239.

This spring, Hmong Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte will have an ordained Hmong permanent deacon, Pe Lee, to minister to their unique needs.

Lee and his family — his wife, Shoua Chang, and their five children — have lived in the United States since 1991. The Lee family moved from California to North Carolina in July 1999 when Lee accepted a position as Hmong catechist for the Diocese of Charlotte.

As a catechist, Lee's duties have included conducting Communion services for the Hmong communities at the Catholic churches in Hickory, Morganton and Albemarle. He also has taught classes to people of all ages, prayed with and visited the sick, and assisted with birth, burial and marriage rituals.

As Hmong children have become more integrated into American society, some of the Hmong traditions and language have been lost. A large part of Lee's job has been to integrate these traditions into the traditions of the Catholic Church.

"I look forward to visiting the Hmong, teaching them about the Hmong culture and Catholicism," said Lee.

"Pe Lee has functioned in the Hmong Ministry in a variety of ways, except sacramentally," said Deacon Louis Pais, co-director of diaconate formation and permanent deacon at St. Mark Church in Huntersville.

Lee is the coordinator of the diocesan Hmong ministry for five counties, assisting at Hmong-language Masses, RCIA and sacramental preparation and youth ministries.

After he is ordained as a permanent deacon, Lee will be able to preside at weddings, baptisms, funerals and Communion services, Deacon Pais said.

"He will be seen by the diocese as being called to a very special ministry," Deacon Pais said.

Of the 20,000 Hmong living in western North Carolina, about 450 of them are Catholic.

"He's done marvelous work and been a wonderful asset to us," said Father Ken Whittington, pastor of St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton.

To serve the many Hmong in the Diocese of Charlotte living in the Hickory area, St. Charles Borromeo Church and St. Aloysius Church in Hickory have Hmong ministries in place and celebrate Hmong-language Masses.

Both Hmong ministry and the permanent diaconate receive funds from the Diocesan Support Appeal.

"The generosity to the DSA of Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte will ensure these ministries continue to touch people's lives," said Barbara Gaddy, associate director of development for the Diocese of Charlotte.

Pe Lee, a candidate for the permanent diaconate, receives his paten from Bishop Peter J. Jugis during the Mass for Institution of Acolytes at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte Nov. 12, 2005. This year, Lee will be the first member of the Hmong community to be ordained as a permanent deacon in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Hmong ministry and the permanent diaconate are two of the ministries supported by contributions to the Diocesan Support Appeal.

DSA GOAL FOR 2006 $4,100,000

Ways to give to the Diocesan Support Appeal

Pledge: Make a pledge and pay it in equal payments over a six-month period. Monthly reminders will be sent beginning in May.

Electronic Fund Transfer (EFT): Monthly pledge payments are taken directly out of your checking or savings account. No hassle of writing and mailing a monthly check.

Fill out the withdrawal authorization on your pledge card and include a voided check. EFTs begin on the 15th of each month after your pledge card and authorization materials are received.

Credit Card Payments: Possibly the easiest method, and you may benefit from rewards on your card, such as airline miles or cash back; and you can enjoy the ease of no paperwork.

Fill out the credit card authorization on your pledge card; include type of card and expiration date.

Credit card payments will be charged on the 15th of the month after your pledge card and authorization materials are received.

Online Giving: You can now give online using a major credit card at www.charlottediocese.org/giving.html. No hassle, no paperwork, no mailings involved.

Stock Donation: Make a donation of publicly traded securities and receive the tax benefits for giving appreciated stock.

A stock donation form and instructions can be downloaded from the diocesan Web site, www.charlottediocese.org/giving.html, or call Barbara Gaddy at (704) 370-3302.

DSA helps many in diocese

DSA, from page 1

Appeal, themed "Touched by Christ, We Respond with Gratitude."

The appeal runs Feb. 4 to March 12.

"The Diocesan Support Appeal is one way we can respond with gratitude to the many ways Jesus touches our lives," said Bishop Jugis.

This year, contributions to the DSA will help support 30 ministries that provide more than 50 programs, including Catholic Social Services; educational, housing and multicultural ministries; and vocations.

The goal of this year's DSA is $4.1 million, and it can be achieved only with support from the Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"Contributing to the DSA gives each Catholic of western North Carolina an opportunity to be a part of something bigger, and to help the church in its ministry throughout the western half of the state," said Bill Weldon, chief financial officer of the Diocese of Charlotte.

"We are very conscious of the sacrifices people make; we have a strong sense of responsibility to use the funds as prudently as possible to achieve the goals of the various ministries and agencies," said Weldon.

People power

"There are thousands of children, youths, elderly, single people and families throughout the diocese who benefit from DSA-funded ministries," said Bishop Jugis.

Some of these ministries provide a direct impact on the life of each parish, he said.

"Catechists, youth ministers, RCIA team members and young adult coordinators all receive training or assistance from our diocesan offices," said Bishop Jugis.

Other ministries also depend on DSA funds to provide services that are beyond the scope and financial ability of any individual parish.

"Imagine the expense and difficulty if each parish had to provide professional services for adoption, counseling, pregnancy support and Hispanic social services," said Bishop Jugis. "Those services are provided at each of the regional Catholic Social Services offices."

The DSA helps support the diocesan Respect Life ministry, part of Catholic Social Service's Family Life Office.

"It allows us to be a voice proclaiming the sanctity of life, from conception until natural death," said Maggi Nadol, Respect Life director.

The DSA also helps fund diaconate formation and seminarian education. This year, 16 men will be ordained to the permanent diaconate, two men to the priesthood and five to the transitional diaconate.

"Funding from the DSA helps provide our seminarians with a quality education and the necessary spiritual formation they need as future priests for the Diocese of Charlotte," said Father Christopher Gober, director of vocations.

"Our seminarian program will eventually touch everyone in the diocese. At least one of our 16 seminarians may serve in your parish in the coming years," said Bishop Jugis. "Your gift to the DSA is a way of personally responding to Jesus' presence in your parish and your life."

Dissecting the DSA

"Most of the ministries have some outside funding, but the DSA is their primary funding source," said Weldon.

"The exception is Catholic Social Services, which receives approximately 75 percent of its total funding from sources other than the DSA," he said.

Each of the parishes and missions within the Diocese of Charlotte is assigned a target — "their share of the overall goal of $4.1 million" said Weldon. "This is accomplished by using a formula established by a task force of lay people, pastors and finance council representatives."

Parish offertory from the last fiscal year is the starting point, said Weldon. Then, 25 percent of parish subsidy to Catholic schools is subtracted from the parish offertory. The resulting number is the basis for a mathematical computation that determines each parish's pro-rata share of the DSA goal.

"If, through parishioner contributions, a particular parish goes over its target, the excess is rebated to the parish," said Weldon. "If a parish falls short of its target, the parish is expected to make up the difference from its own budget."

Planning for this year's DSA began last fall as budgeting for the 2006-2007 fiscal year began. Establishing the current goal of $4.1 million involved account-by-account budgets for each program and ministry that receives DSA funding, said Weldon.

"Two components — program changes and cost increases — are examined when establishing the DSA budget," he said. "We have tried very hard to limit cost increases while expanding program services."

The $4.1 million goal represents an increase of 3.8 percent over last year's goal. The amount budgeted for each ministry is published in this issue of The Catholic News & Herald on page 8.

"As the people of the diocese entrust us with their gifts, we are then accountable to them for the use of these resources," said Weldon.

"We are committed to the highest standards of fiscal integrity and accountability," he said. "The diocese has procedures in place to direct the disbursement of funds in accordance with donor intent and to ensure that all financial activity is accounted for properly."

"Financial oversight is provided by annual financial audits and the diocesan finance council," said Weldon.

A complete financial report of the previous year is published as a supplement to The Catholic News & Herald in the fall of each year. The report includes a breakdown of DSA funding by ministry.

Making the pledge

During the past week, registered parishioners should have received pledge cards and letters at their homes from Bishop Jugis, asking for their support of the DSA.

"I am constantly reminded that those who give always receive something in return," said Bishop Jugis. "I am confident that you will be blessed with abundant grace for your generosity to our diocesan ministries."

Preventing piracy

Vatican says it will protect pope's writings, enforce copyright

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican publishing house has made it clear it will protect the writings of Pope Benedict XVI and the copyright it owns over every speech, homily and document he writes.

A storm erupted in Italy in late January after the Libreria Editrice Vaticana, the Vatican Publishing House, sent a bill for more than $18,000 seeking royalties and legal costs to a Milan-based publisher.

Italian authors and publishers began talking about new, secret rules that would make it difficult, if not impossible, to spread the pope's message.

The Vatican Publishing House said the rules are not new or secret, but they are necessary to prevent pirated copies of papal documents — texts sold under the pope's name but with no Vatican control over the content and no compensation to the Vatican.

An Italian newspaper said the Milan publisher billed by the Vatican had quoted "about 30 lines" from speeches Pope Benedict made immediately before and after his April 19 election.

But in a Jan. 23 statement the Vatican publisher said the introduction to the 124-page book explicitly told readers, "Everything you will find here, after the introduction, comes from the pen or the voice of Joseph Ratzinger," now Pope Benedict.

The book was being sold for about $12 a copy, and it was published without the knowledge or consent of the Vatican, the Vatican said.

Francesca Angeletti, who handles copyright permissions for the Vatican, said the Vatican wanted to ensure the integrity of texts attributed to the pope and to prevent publishers from making money off his works without the knowledge of the Vatican and without giving the Vatican appropriate compensation.

Newspapers, magazines and bishops' conferences, she said, still may publish papal texts without paying royalties as long as the texts are not changed and a line is included saying the text has been copyrighted by the Libreria Editrice Vaticana.

Publishers who produce books or tracts reprinting papal texts will be asked to pay between 3 percent and 5 percent of the cover price to the Vatican.

A memo written by Salesian Father Claudio Rossini, director of the Libreria Editrice Vaticana, outlining how the copyrights would be handled was distributed to publishers at the Frankfurt (Germany) Book Fair in October and sent to all Italian publishers, the Vatican said.

Jesus' touch helps us to shine

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When my wife and I were VISTA volunteers in the foothills of the Ozarks in Northwest Arkansas, we lived down the road from a man who had a problem with alcohol. Plus he didn't work regularly, though I'm not sure the two problems were directly linked in his case.

His wife was probably a saint.

She supplemented the shortfall in income from her husband's lack of industry by keeping a garden, picking whatever berries were in season and through general economies as she cooked the family's meals on the wood-burning stove in their small frame house, wallpapered in newspapers.

But through all the deprivations of her life, she maintained a beatific presence that I've realized recently could only have come from one source.

She must have had a pretty direct link to our Lord, and the confidence that relationship gave her must have caused the glow that spread from her smiling face and into the maturing, responsible lives her children were able to build.

The laws of the state (and perhaps those of the church as well) might have released this woman from the bonds of her marriage, but the blessing of her love of God freed her to live as a child of the light, even in these trying circumstances.

The leper in this week's Gospel reading was freed by the direct exercise of God's power in Jesus, the power to heal. Had he continued in his life without that touch, the law would have held him bound to its restrictions.

But he had Jesus' touch instead.

How many among us, faithful in the midst of trying family situations, must give evidence of that touch today — whether we glow or not.

'On Eagle's Wings' tops all songs in online liturgical music survey

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — "On Eagle's Wings," the musical reworking of the 91st Psalm by Father Michael Joncas, topped all other songs in an online poll asking which liturgical song most fostered and nourished the respondent's life.

Two songs made popular by the St. Louis Jesuits — "Here I Am, Lord" and "Be Not Afraid" — came in second and third, followed by "You Are Mine," by David Haas.

The online poll was sponsored by the National Association of Pastoral Musicians.

The poll was featured last year in an issue of its membership magazine, Pastoral Music, and announcements about the poll were distributed to diocesan newspapers in an effort to get the input of "rank-and-file Catholics," said J. Michael McMahon, the association's president.

In the poll, respondents could vote for only one song. No songs were listed on the Web site to give them suggestions. About 3,000 people took part in the poll.

Of the 25 liturgical music songs mentioned most, songs written after the Second Vatican Council took not only the top four positions, but six of the top nine, and 12 of the top 25. The fourth-ranked song, "You Are Mine," received 138 votes, 81 percent more votes than the fifth-ranked song, "How Great Thou Art," which got 76.

McMahon cautioned against the notion that post-Vatican II music has dominance over all other liturgical music.

"We got 670 different songs mentioned," he said. "Even the top choice is only 8 percent of the total," or 242 votes.

The poll results didn't surprise him.

"It panned out pretty much like the way I expected," he said, adding that a British Catholic newspaper conducted a similar survey, which found "Here I Am, Lord" to be the top choice of its readers.

Rounding out the pastoral musicians association's top 10 was, in sixth place, the traditional Catholic hymn "Holy God, We Praise Thy Name," whose lyrics are ascribed to Ignaz Franz, followed by John Newton's "Amazing Grace," Marty Haugen's "All Are Welcome," Sebastian Temple's "Prayer of St. Francis," and "Ave Maria."

Those who voted for "Ave Maria" and "Panis Angelicus," which finished 15th, probably meant the versions by Franz Schubert and Cesar Franck, respectively, "but we don't know for sure," McMahon said.

One Spanish-language song, "Pescador de Hombres," made the list, finishing 17th. Many hymnals print English-language companion lyrics, calling the song "Lord, When You Came to the Seashore."

In his current interim job, McMahon said, he asked "who had heard this song,

'Annapolis' not worth attending

James Franco (left) and Tyrese Gibson star in "Annapolis," a diverting but derivative drama about a scrappy shipyard worker who, after being accepted to the U.S. Naval Academy, must prove his mettle while training for the school's boxing tournament against his no-nonsense drill instructor.

Though director Justin Lin's adrenalized climax achieves its desired rousing effect, this retread of "An Officer and a Gentleman" is hollow and formulaic.

Brutal boxing sequences, an attempted suicide, some sexually crude language and humor, as well as profanity. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. and only one did, and she came from Latin America."

McMahon said this points to "the divergence of American Catholic churches," including "the hymnals they use," since songs published by one copyright holder don't always find their way into the hymnals of their competitors.

Other contemporary Catholic songs in the top 25 were "We Are Called," 11th place; "I Am the Bread of Life," 13th; "The Summons," 14th; "Shepherd Me, O God," 19th; "One Bread, One Body," 22nd, and "Hosea," which tied for 24th place with the traditional Catholic hymn

"Pange Lingua."

Other traditional Catholic hymns on the list were "Ave Verum Corpus," 20th, and "Tantum Ergo," 23rd.

Songs on the list with roots in Protestant or evangelical hymnody included Richard Gillard's "The Servant Song," 16th place, and Donna Marie McCargill's "Servant Song," 18th.

Also making the list were "Let There Be Peace on Earth," in 12th place, and "Lord of the Dance," in 21st.

"Both found their way into liturgical use, but came from outside the (liturgical music) culture," McMahon said.

Keeping the dream alive

Annual event celebrates life, legacy of Rev. King

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — They came from North and South Carolina, from a variety of backgrounds and cultures to celebrate their uniqueness and their similarity.

It was the kind of unity envisioned by Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

Approximately 275 people gathered for the Martin Luther King Jr. celebration at the Hilton at University Place in Charlotte Jan. 21.

The diocesan African American Affairs Ministry sponsored the annual event, celebrated for the past 19 years. The ministry was established in 1985 to give visibility to the work of black Catholics in the diocese and to educate others to the needs and contributions of black Catholics in the church.

"The celebration is a vehicle to ensure that parishioners across the diocese are aware of the life and legacy of Dr. King" and the contributions of "African Americans to our society," said Sandy Murdock, African American Affairs Ministry director.

As with last year's celebration, the event was held the weekend following national Martin Luther King Jr. Day Jan. 16, to avoid conflicting with other commemorative and multicultural events taking place in the Charlotte area.

Event planners strove to present an ecumenical program, appealing to all races and religions.

"This was the largest attendance recorded in the history of this celebration," said Murdock. "It included people of West African, African American, Caucasian, Hispanic, Indian, Asian, Native American and Irish cultures."

The daylong event featured cultural presentations from the local Cherokee, Hmong, Laotian, Hispanic and Irish communities. Gospel music was provided by Perpetual Hope Choir from Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte.

Rev. Dr. Shelton Shipman, pastor of Greenville African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church in Charlotte, facilitated an interactive workshop, while Deacon Henry Fulmer, a Franciscan friar at St. Martin de Porres Church in Columbia, S.C., was the keynote speaker. He called his audience to action.

"Brother Fulmer said Rev. King had a dream and he helped people to work toward that dream. Some of it has been reached, but we can lose sight of it," said Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of diocesan Hispanic ministry.

"We have to continually ask ourselves, 'Where do we go from here?'" said Sister Inkrott.

"Brother Fulmer touched on things we need to stay focused on — where we came from and what we need to do about the conditions of today," said Charlotte House, a parishioner at St. Martin de Porres Church.

"Do we be followers of Christ or be complacent? We need to stay focused on Christ's mission of love for everyone, but be proactive to get things done," she said.

Rev. King wanted people to communicate the Christ-like essence that's in each of us, said House, and "was about people coming together out of love to help one another."

"If Dr. King were alive today ... he would be fighting for equality in the United States in education, health care, social justice and elder care," said Murdock. "On a worldwide scope, he would be fighting for hunger, AIDS and HIV, economic improvement in various African countries and world peace."

"When you listened to him (Rev. King) speak, it was as if he was touched by God," said James "Bo" Taylor, an archivist at the Museum of the Cherokee Indian in Cherokee, who presented a session on Native American music and song. "He wasn't talking about one people, but all people," said Taylor, who said Rev. King did much for Native Americans.

"As native people, we have to respect what he did for us," said Taylor. "Equality means equal."

A preacher and civil rights leader, Rev. King sought to bring peaceful reconciliation among all Americans, urging racial justice and equal opportunity for all, regardless of race.

While in Memphis, Tenn., Rev. King was assassinated April 4, 1968 by an escaped white convict. After his death, Rev. King became a symbol of protest in the struggle for racial justice.

Many felt the diocesan celebration was a good way to foster understanding among ethnic groups.

"In order to understand a people, you have to know them," said Taylor.

Murdock called the celebration a "wonderful success."

"Dr. King loved all people, and he would have stood proud and boldly accepted our acknowledgement and our honor of him and his legacy," she said.

African American Affairs Ministry is supported by contributions to the Diocesan Support Appeal.

ATLANTA (CNS) — Coretta Scott King, widow of Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., died Jan. 30 at age 78 at a holistic health center in Baja California, Mexico.

"The entire nation stands in awe of the wondrous legacy of this great woman of faith," said Archbishop Wilton

D. Gregory of Atlanta Jan. 31.

King had received several honors and awards during her lifetime, including an award from the Appeal of Conscience Foundation and the Freedom Medal.

Born April 27, 1927, she and Rev. King were married June 18, 1953.

French nun's cure could be miracle for Pope John Paul II

case of the French nun from among the many apparently miraculous healings people from around the world had reported to him.

He told Catholic News Service Jan. 31 that the case involved a French religious who had been diagnosed with Parkinson's when she was "very young; it was a precocious onset."

Pope John Paul had suffered from Parkinson's, a progressive disease that attacks the nervous system.

Msgr. Oder had refused to talk about the French nun's case in late November when Pope John Paul's former personal secretary, Archbishop Stanislaw Dziwisz of Krakow, Poland, told reporters her healing would be submitted to Vatican investigators.

Newspapers had reported at the time that the French nun was suffering from cancer, but Msgr. Oder said it was Parkinson's.

The postulator told CNS he had felt it was important not to talk about the case until several doctors had reviewed the nun's case history and confirmed that there likely was no natural or medical explanation for her healing.

While Pope Benedict XVI set aside the normal five-year waiting period before Pope John Paul's cause could be opened, Msgr. Oder said there is still much work to do. People who knew the pope are being interviewed, a thorough biography is being prepared and all his writings are being collected for study by a panel of theologians.

Before Pope Benedict can proclaim that Pope John Paul heroically lived a life of Christian virtue, Msgr. Oder must compile all the information collected in a "positio," a document of multiple volumes explaining who the candidate was and how he or she lived and acted.

A separate report is prepared on the miracle, Msgr. Oder said.

"The procedure for the verification of the miracle is a process that can parallel the verification of heroic virtues," he said, so the miracle can be submitted even before the "positio" is. Nevertheless, he said, he does not expect the process to be completed soon.

While a Vatican panel of historians and theologians will review the "positio," another panel of Vatican theologians and a panel of Vatican-appointed physicians will review the nun's medical records.

In Poland, the head of a Polish tribunal gathering evidence for the cause criticized media speculation about witnesses after press reports that the country's former communist strongman, Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, had been asked to give evidence.

"It's natural and right that people should be interested in our work," said Bishop Tadeusz Pieronek, head of the Krakow Theological Academy as well as the tribunal.

"But the witnesses are covered by secrecy rules — those called should be discreet about the questions they're asked and how they answered," he said.

The bishop said witnesses were summoned according to their knowledge of "important moments" in Pope John Paul's life.

"The tribunal can't be expected to consider how a particular summons will be publicly interpreted, nor does it see such invitations in terms of rewards and punishments," he said.

Jaruzelski, who was educated at a Marian order school and was raised a Catholic, became notorious for supervising the arrest and internment of around 10,000 opponents of communist rule after crushing the Solidarity labor movement with martial law in December 1981.

Jonathan Luxmoore in Warsaw, Poland contributed to this story.

Stop suffering in silence

Recent headlines have been filled with reports of people struggling with thoughts and feelings so painful and terrible that they are compelled to act in unimaginable ways. Now, our own community is reeling from the tragic deaths of two little girls and the unfathomable pain of a beloved family.

We are left to wonder how this could happen. While there may never be an answer that completely explains these horrible acts, perhaps we can use this time to be reminded of the importance of breaking the chain of silence and taking steps to escape the despair of depression.

Speak out

People feel there is nowhere to turn, no one who will understand what they are going through. They may feel ashamed and scared by what is happening to them.

These are the "lies" that depression tells us and they are absolutely false. Silence feeds feelings of helplessness. Solitude in dealing with problems can lead to loss of hope.

There are tremendous resources available when someone reaches out and simply says, "I need help." Tell a friend or a loved one, a priest, a helpline operator.

Start by allowing others to know you are in pain and need support.

Get help now

The National Institute of Mental Health reports that 9.5 percent of Americans suffer from a depressive disorder.

The symptoms of depression include: sad or "empty" mood, loss of pleasure, appetite disturbance, sleep disturbance, either restlessness or feeling slowed down and heavy, loss of energy, feeling worthless or preoccupied by guilt, difficulty concentrating, thoughts of death and dying.

If left untreated or in more extreme cases, there may be thoughts of suicide, delusions (false beliefs) or even hallucinations (experiencing something through sight, sound, or other senses that is not really there).

Medication helps

The balance of our brain's chemistry is extremely important to our sense of well-being. When there is an imbalance, our mood will be affected.

There are numerous medications available now that can make a big difference in bringing that brain chemistry into harmony.

Are there side effects? Yes, but many side effects are temporary and not as noticeable when one becomes used to the medications.

If medications in the past have been less than helpful, do not give up. No one

Peace of Mind

pill works for everyone and sometimes it takes a careful combination of medications to get it right.

Also, be aware that it may take several weeks for certain medications to build up to a "therapeutic level" — the point where a person can start to really feel a difference.

All of this should be discussed with one's physician. A psychiatrist is a medical doctor who is specially trained in this department.

Professional counseling

Through talk therapy, we are able to explore feelings and beliefs in a confidential and supportive environment. There can be great relief in having a place to bring problems and have help in making real changes.

Spirituality brings hope

Depression can also impact how a person is feeling spiritually, leading us to question faith, even God, and come up with empty answers.

However, the reverse is also true: spiritual beliefs and experiencing closeness to God can bring comfort, hope and empowerment in dealing with depression. Consider speaking with a priest, spiritual advisor or prayer partner.

Timing is important

Don't wait. Don't let the pain worsen and deepen.

Thoughts and feelings go hand in hand. Just as negative thoughts create dark feelings, dark feelings create negative thoughts. It's important not to wait until these thoughts and feelings start to affect behavior.

Many people who decide to speak up and get help regret not having done it sooner.

The counseling team at Catholic Social Services in the Diocese of Charlotte is available to help people who are dealing with depression and other issues. We offer professional, affordable counseling in a faith-based setting.

Please call me at (704) 370-3238 to schedule an appointment, or visit our Web site at www.cssnc.org.

Lori Fox is supervisor of counseling services for Catholic Social Services in the Diocese of Charlotte.

'Touched by Christ, We Respond with Gratitude'

DSA-funded ministries important part of many lives

Guest Column

BARBARA GADDY
GUEST COLUMNIST

The theme of the 2006 Diocesan Support Appeal, "Touched by Christ, We Respond with Gratitude," gives me an opportunity to reflect on the many times I have been touched by the presence of Jesus in my own life.

My thoughts immediately turn to the births of my three daughters. I remember counting their little fingers and toes, stroking their faces and peering into their bright eyes. I really felt I was touched by Christ in each of those experiences and was overwhelmed with gratitude.

I also realize that I had an enormous responsibility to care for each of these gifts from God — the responsibility to provide for their physical, spiritual and emotional needs.

I must admit that, at the time, I certainly did not think about the Diocesan Support Appeal-funded ministries and how they might relate to my own children. In fact, the DSA was about the furthest thing from my mind.

I was a lot more concerned with the everyday business of caring for these children. Yet the theme of this year's appeal prompts me a chance to look back over the years and recall all the ways these DSA ministries touched our lives.

When my oldest daughter turned 3, I registered her for the preschool religious education class. They needed catechists and, having a background in education, I decided to volunteer. I participated in the catechists' certification program to give me all the tools I needed to help form these children in the faith.

Over the years, I was both "Mom" and "Sunday school teacher" to every one of my girls. Then I was asked to become the coordinator for the parish faith formation program.

I went through two years of classes that better prepared me to provide quality programs for children, youth, adults and

RCIA in my own parish.

Meanwhile my children grew into teenagers and became active in the parish youth group. They attended the programs and retreats sponsored by the diocesan Office of Youth Ministry.

My oldest child was deeply concerned about issues of community outreach. While still a high school student, she participated in a six-week program called "Moving Faith into Action," sponsored by the diocesan Office of Justice & Peace.

As college students, they took advantage of campus ministry programs offered at their schools.

So as I travel down memory lane, I can see all the ways DSA-funded ministries have touched my own life and, either directly or indirectly, the lives of my girls, through faith formation, youth ministry, adult education, justice and peace, and campus ministry.

These all represent ways we were "touched by Christ."

I invite you to consider just one way you have been touched by Christ. Perhaps it was the births of your own children. Maybe it was through a special liturgy or program, the kindness of your pastor or deacon, or the companionship of your parish senior group.

Now take your own trip down memory lane. Chances are very good that you or someone close to you benefited in some way from one of the DSA-funded ministries.

With a gift to the 2006 Diocesan Support Appeal, you can help ensure that all of these ministries will continue to touch the lives of people throughout the diocese.

Barbara Gaddy is associate director of development for the Diocese of Charlotte.

The Eucharist brings unity in charity for Catholics

Thank you for your overwhelmingly positive response to our Eucharistic Congress last September. Because of the great interest you showed in such a gathering in our diocese, plans are underway for our second Eucharistic Congress, to be held Oct. 6 and 7 of this year. I hope you are already making plans to participate!

The Eucharistic Congress is truly diocesan-wide in its scope. It is the one time a year when the entire Catholic family of the Diocese of Charlotte has the opportunity to come together to celebrate our oneness in Christ through the sacrament of unity, the Holy Eucharist.

It is a gathering of the priests, both diocesan and religious; the deacons; the women religious; all the seminarians; all the parishes and missions; all the schools; and all the staff in the diocesan offices.

St. John writes in his Gospel that Our Lord prayed for this unity among his disciples during the Last Supper: "I pray ... that they may all be one, as you, Father, are in me and I in you, that they also may be in us, that the world may believe that you sent me" (John 17: 20-21).

The prayer for unity, and the institution of the Holy Eucharist as the sacrament of unity, proceeded together from the heart of the Lord at the moment of the Last Supper.

The theme for the 2006 Eucharistic Congress is "The Love of Christ Impels Us," a line taken from St. Paul's second letter to the Corinthians (2 Cor 5:14). The love of Christ that we celebrate in

From the Bishop

MOST REV.
PETER J. JUGIS
BISHOP OF CHARLOTTE

the Eucharistic Sacrifice transforms us interiorly. It becomes the force that impels us to live faithful Catholic lives.

We partake of the real body and blood of Christ, and we grow in love. Our union with Christ is renewed and strengthened. And in addition, our union with each other is renewed and strengthened.

Through our sharing in Christ's body and blood, Christ makes us one in Him. It is the Holy Eucharist that brings about this unity in charity.

The celebration of the Holy Eucharist stands at the center of the life of the parish. It is the most important activity of the parish, and it unifies all the other activities of the parish.

The love that Christ places in us through our participation in Mass flows out from the Mass to be lived in all the other activities of the parish: in faith formation classes, youth ministry programs, visitations to the sick, activities of our parish organizations and even in social gatherings. All of these ministries and activities ultimately draw their vitality from our worship.

The celebration of the Eucharistic Sacrifice gives life and meaning to all parish activities, imbuing those ministries and activities with Christ's love. The Holy Eucharist truly is the source of the life of the church. It is the engine that drives the entire life of the parish.

Our participation in the Eucharistic Sacrifice also brings Christ's love into everything we do outside of the parish, in our everyday life in the home and in society, at school, at work in our professions and in our social involvements. The love of Christ we celebrate in the Eucharist ultimately transforms all these areas of our lives, because we ourselves have first been transformed by our participation in the Holy Sacrifice.

It is beautiful to realize how Christ animates everything in our everyday life, and how everything ultimately comes back to the Eucharist as its source. That is why the Second Vatican Council encouraged our full, conscious and active participation (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 14) in the Eucharistic Sacrifice; so much depends on the Mass to give life to our effective witness to Christ's love.

It is in the Eucharistic Sacrifice where we meet Christ and come into deeper union with Him. Our union with Him is a union of love, which we bring with us into our parish activities and ministries, and into our life outside the parish.

Let us find through our active participation in the eucharistic celebration and in our eucharistic adoration outside of Mass, the love which impels us in our daily living for Christ. Let us begin to prepare now for the many blessings that are in store for us at our October Eucharistic Congress!

VATICAN CITY — God wants all men and women to cooperate with him in forming a world marked by harmony and peace, Pope Benedict XVI said.

At his Feb. 1 weekly general audience, the pope said the biblical phrase "kingdom of God" is an expression of God's saving plan for all humanity, a plan that includes God's active presence in human history.

"We are not at the mercy of dark forces, nor are we left alone with our freedom, rather we have been entrusted to the action of the powerful and loving Lord who has a plan for us, a kingdom to establish," the pope said.

"He is not indifferent to human history, but rather wants to realize with us and for us his plan of harmony and peace," he said.

Pope Benedict said men and women of every nation and every generation are called to follow God's will for their lives and allow his presence to be felt in the world.

Throughout history, he said, God has revealed his love for people, intervening to guide and protect them and sending his Son to save them.

All that God already has done and continues to do in history reveals that his kingdom is not based on "power and domination, triumph and oppression as unfortunately frequently occurs with earthly kingdoms, but this kingdom of God is a demonstration of mercy, tenderness, goodness, grace and justice," the pope said.

The Old Testament profession that God is slow to anger and rich in mercy, he said, is "a preparation for the profession of faith of St. John the Apostle, who said, 'God is love.'"

The words before Communion

Q. Nearly all priests and other Communion ministers say "The body of Christ" before giving us Communion. But one priest who helps out in our parish says "You are the body of Christ," and we answer "Amen."

I thought I was affirming my belief in the real presence of Jesus in the Eucharist. Is there a change or an option for the words before Communion? (California)

A. What your visiting priest proclaims before giving Communion is, of course, true. As St. Augustine taught frequently, receiving Communion is for Christians a many faceted expression of faith: The body of Christ gives the body of Christ to the body of Christ.

The priest, a member of Christ's body, gives the eucharistic body to one who is already part of the body of Christ, the church.

It is a profound and beautiful mystery.

In Christian tradition, however, and according to liturgical rules, the profession of faith made in the "Amen" before Communion is a particularly specific expression of eucharistic belief. As you suggest, the communicant's "Amen" is a declaration of belief in the real presence of Jesus under the species of bread and wine.

But it is more than that.

The full significance of that "Amen" goes even deeper. In the consecration of the Eucharist at Mass, Jesus declares that in the eucharistic species he offers his body specifically as given for us and his blood specifically as shed for us.

Therefore, the command of the Lord that follows, "Do this in memory of me," means more than merely to perform a liturgical act, to "make" his person present in the eucharistic bread and wine at Mass. He tells us that, as he has given his life for us, we are to give our lives for each other.

At Communion time, then, our "Amen," our yes, means not only that we believe it is the body and blood of Christ. It further signifies that we accept the meaning Jesus has given to this eucharistic union; we promise to give ourselves in wholehearted love to the service of others, as he has given himself for us.

Perhaps we have not heard much about this understanding of receiving Communion, but it is not a new idea in the church, nor is it a speculative novelty. Early Christian bishops and theologians write often that this is what Communion in fact must mean for us who receive it.

St. Augustine, for example, reflects this theology in his homily on the feast of the martyrdom of St. Lawrence.

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN
DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

"Just as Jesus Christ laid down his life for us, so we ought to lay down our lives for the brothers," he says. "Lawrence understood this. Just as he had partaken of the gift of Christ's self at the table of the Lord, so he prepared to offer such a gift."

By focusing attention on one aspect of the Eucharist, as the priest in your parish does, he seriously diminishes the impact of the specific interpretation the church points us to as we receive Communion.

It is true, we are the body of Christ. But the sacrament of eucharistic Communion directs us in a special way to what Jesus wants that to mean. It is a unique way he unites us to his attitude about himself, who did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life for his brothers and sisters (Matthew 20:28).

Mountain mission serves dedicated community of Catholics

SPARTA — The mission church dedicated to St. Frances of Rome celebrates 40 years of existence in 2006, thus marking nearly half a century of Catholic evangelization in North Carolina's Allegheny County.

Before the early 1960s, Catholics in this mountain county trekked over the hills to Elkin or to North Wilkesboro to attend Mass. In 1961, priests from North Wilkesboro began traveling to Sparta, just four miles from the Virginia border, to celebrate Mass.

The local Catholics proved to be an industrious group during the 1960s, with Masses celebrated in the Sparta Community Center, the Veterans of Foreign Wars Hall, the homes of area Catholics and in the cafeteria of a shoe factory.

Though small in number, the Catholic population was determined to spiritually reinforce its presence by building a church. In 1965, Mary Ann Robinson — a New York Catholic whose nephew, Ed Darr, was one of the original parishioners of the mission church — paved the way for construction to begin. With a grant from the Catholic Church Extension Society, the project was underway.

Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh dedicated St. Frances of Rome Church in May 1966 in memory of Frances Payne Darr, Ed Darr's mother.

The church continued to be staffed by priests from North Wilkesboro until 1976. During that year, St. Francis of Assisi Church in Jefferson assumed pastoral care of the Sparta church. Priests of the Glenmary Home Missioners also arrived to serve at the churches in Allegheny and Ashe counties

St. Frances of Rome Church in Sparta has served a small but dedicated community of Catholics in Allegheny County for 40 years.

In the mid-1980s, the St. Frances of Rome family began a fundraising drive with the intention of building a multi-purpose education building. After again turning to the Catholic Church Extension Society for assistance, the Catholic community in Sparta oversaw the building's construction.

Then-Bishop John F. Donoghue of Charlotte blessed and dedicated the structure in October 1986 at a Mass attended by more than 200 Catholics, friends and clergy, including then-pastor Glenmary Father John Otterbacher.

Members of the Sparta Catholic community, who had called the fund drive a "journey in faith," could now enjoy a stronger sense of home with the addition. The building includes not only classrooms, but also a reception hall and kitchen.

Church membership in Sparta has increased from the three families who Glenmary priests served the mission church until 1998, when diocesan priests assumed pastoral care. Fathers Ronald Marecki, Wilbur Thomas and Mark Lawlor were three of the pastors to serve Sparta Catholics in the late 1990s.

In July 2004, St. Frances of Rome Church and its mother parish, St. Francis of Assisi Church in Jefferson, welcomed Father Patrick Winslow as administrator.

STATESVILLE — Understanding the paschal, or Easter, mystery is a lifetime project, according to a theologian specializing in Christian initiation.

Father Andrew Varga, pastor of St. Luke Church in Westport, Conn., presented "Mystagogy: Unfolding the Paschal Mystery" to approximately 50 people from 20 parishes around the Diocese of Charlotte.

The presentation, held at St. Philip the Apostle Church in Statesville Jan. 21, was sponsored by the Diocesan Commission on the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults to provide theological training in mystagogy to initiation ministers, who help bring adult converts into the Catholic Church.

The RCIA is the norms and rituals for adults who wish to enter the Catholic Church. Mystagogy, the fourth and final stage of the RCIA process, is the ongoing instruction in the

STRIDING FOR A MIRACLE

Rebecca Dussault of Gunnison, Colo., skis during the Alberta Centennial World Cup in Canmore, Alberta, in December 2005. The Catholic athlete will be part of the U.S. cross-country ski team during the 2006 Winter Olympics in Turin, Italy, which begin Feb. 10.

Colorado skier goes to Turin Olympics with faith, family in tow

DENVER (CNS) — If U.S. cross-country skier Rebecca Dussault, 25, wins a medal at the Winter Olympic Games Feb. 10-26 in Turin, Italy, she'll be the first American woman ever to have done so.

The realistic dream for the gifted, self-coached athlete is to place in the top 15.

"That would be pretty much the best U.S. women's result ever," she said. "There's about 80 competitors per sport and the sport has been dominated by Europeans."

But with God, all things are possible — and Dussault is a woman of strong Catholic faith.

In 2004 Dussault developed a deep appreciation for Blessed Pier Giorgio Frassati, a young Italian outdoorsman who lived an exemplary life of prayer and charity in the early 1900s.

Setting her sights on the 2006 Winter Games, she made Blessed Pier Giorgio the patron of her Olympic journey after realizing several similarities in their lives.

"He died at 24 and (my husband and I) were both 24," she said. "He's from Turin, Italy, and that's where the Olympics were going to be. He was a mountaineer and we're mountaineers."

Last August, as part of their World Youth Day trip to Germany, Dussault and her husband visited sites where Blessed Pier Giorgio lived and hiked in Turin. They were allowed into Blessed Pier Giorgio's family home and met his younger sister, Luciana, who is 103.

"We prayed at the bed where he died, saw his skis and pictures and rosaries and the sanctuary he would run over the mountains to pray at," Dussault said.

While her dream is to win an Olympic medal, it's not her first priority. Her faith is.

A cradle Catholic, Dussault's faith became important to her at age 12, when she switched from public school to being home-schooled. Religion was a key part of the curriculum. She became enthralled with the richness and beauty of the Catholic faith — the sacraments, prayer, Mary and the lives of the saints.

"I had something to fall in love with," Dussault said, describing her growing faith knowledge. "It came alive for me and I made it my own."

At the Olympics, Dussault is asking the intercession of Blessed Pier Giorgio, who needs a miracle attributed to him if he is to achieve sainthood.

"Everybody hopes for the gold," Dussault said. "We've been telling people, 'Everything is possible for God.' ... If I'm going to win ... it's going to be by the intercession of (Blessed Pier Giorgio) — and the prayers of many faithful. I can't believe how many people are praying for me all around the world."

Don't kill mentally disabled person to save genius, says bioethicist

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Because human dignity is equal for all, doctors cannot take the life of a severely developmentally disabled person to harvest organs to save the life of a scientific genius such as Albert Einstein, said Franciscan Brother Daniel Sulmasy, a medical doctor and bioethicist.

There are not different levels of "inalienable dignity," he told the President's Council on Bioethics Feb. 2.

The intrinsic dignity of every person is the "foundational bedrock of a moral system" and should be the guiding force in bioethics, said Brother Sulmasy, director of the Bioethics Institute of New York Medical College.

The Franciscan was one of two guest speakers discussing the meaning of human dignity before the council, which advises President George W. Bush on bioethical issues.

During a question-and-answer session, Brother Sulmasy discussed the equality that human dignity gives all people.

"Is it true that a severely retarded person is the equal of Michael Jordan or Albert Einstein?" asked Robert George, a professor of jurisprudence at Princeton University and member of the President's Council on Bioethics.

Brother Sulmasy answered: "Yes, it is true. But if we behave in a manner consistent with this is another thing."

Council member Dr. Leon Kass, professor of social thought at the University of Chicago, asked if medical attention would be required at the end of a human life when a person is losing all his human capabilities.

Brother Sulmasy said that there is a natural finality to life in which a person loses his human capabilities. In such situations "one is not obliged to do everything possible" to prolong life, "but we cannot do something to snuff out life."

Brother Sulmasy did not apply his views on human dignity to assisted suicide or euthanasia during the council, but opposed both in writing to the council.

FROM THE VATICAN

To respect life, people must remember God created it, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The more people set aside belief in God the creator, the greater the danger that they will lose respect for the value and dignity of human life, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Celebrating Mass Feb. 5 in the Vatican's parish church, the Church of St. Anne, and marking Italy's pro-life day, Pope Benedict said that when people stop thinking of human life as a creation of God they begin to think they have complete control over it.

Pope Benedict said Jesus came to earth as a human being in order to heal people of the "fevers" of ideologies and idolatry and of forgetting God.

"Where God is absent, the human person is no longer respected," the pope said.

Jesus did not come to earth primarily to heal people of physical maladies, the pope said, but to "reconcile them with God. God is our creator. God gave us life, dignity."

While men and women are called to safeguard and administer creation, they are not the lords of life, and they cannot presume to determine whether life is or is not of value, he said.

Even before organizing pro-life initiatives, the pope said, "it is fundamental to promote a correct attitude toward the other: The culture of life is, in effect, based on attention to others without exclusion or discrimination.

"Every human life deserves and needs to be defended and promoted," the pope said.

Too often "life is exalted as long as it is pleasurable, but there is a tendency not to respect it any longer when it becomes ill or disabled," Pope Benedict said.

When every human life is loved because it is created by God, then efforts to defend life — whether the life of a newborn, the infirm or the dying — become effective, the pope said.

Pope authorizes indulgences for caring for the mentally ill

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — On the occasion of World Day of the Sick, Catholics can receive special indulgences for caring for people who are ill or suffer from mental illness.

Pope Benedict XVI authorized the indulgences to encourage the faithful to show "Christian compassion and social solidarity toward the ill, especially toward those affected by mental illness," said U.S. Cardinal J. Francis Stafford, head of the Apostolic Penitentiary, the Vatican tribunal that regulates indulgences.

The Vatican announced the indulgences and outlined the requirements for receiving them Feb. 3.

An indulgence is a remission of the temporal punishment due for sins committed.

The 14th World Day of the Sick will be held in Adelaide, Australia, Feb. 11. The event's focus this year will be on mental health and the importance of offering proper care and support for people who suffer from mental illness.

Cardinal Stafford said the special indulgences include the normal requirements set by the church for all plenary indulgences: that within a reasonably short period of time the person goes to confession, receives the Eucharist and prays for the intentions of the pope, all in a spirit of total detachment from the attraction of sin.

Special plenary indulgences, he said, would be given to those who fulfill the normal requirements in conjunction with participating "with devotion" in a sacred ceremony in the St. Francis Xavier Cathedral in Adelaide or "any other place established by ecclesial authorities" dedicated to celebrating World Day of the Sick.

Cardinal Stafford said Catholics who, "like good Samaritans," work to help those who are ill — especially the mentally ill — and will not be able to attend a World Day of the Sick ceremony because they will be on duty could still earn the indulgence.

On Feb. 11 they must "generously offer their loving assistance to the sick for at least a couple of hours," caring for them as they would care for Christ, he said.

They must also fulfill the normal requirements for an indulgence when they can, he added.

Catholics who because of illness or other serious reason cannot take part in a Feb. 11 ceremony could still earn the indulgence, he said, by "devotedly praying for ill people" and offering their illness and difficulties up to the Lord, all in a spirit of total detachment from the attraction of sin.

The faithful could receive a partial indulgence during Feb. 9-11 by praying "with a repentant heart" for aid to ill people.

NEW HOUSE MAJORITY LEADER A GRADUATE OF CATHOLIC SCHOOLS

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Newly elected House majority leader Rep. John Boehner, a Catholic, is graduate of Cincinnati-area Catholic schools and Jesuit-run Xavier University.

Boehner, 56, has represented Ohio's 8th District since 1990. Among his efforts in Congress have been backing a school voucher plan for the District of Columbia and supporting a private effort to get businesses to help support needy Catholic schools in Washington.

A profile of Boehner in Xavier Magazine, published by the university, described Boehner as "a foe of abortion and gay adoptions," who "says he's a practical conservative mainstream Republican."

Boehner's counterpart across the aisle, House minority leader Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., also is a Catholic. She became the first woman to lead either party in Congress when she was elected to the post in 2002.

American flag from Capitol flown at Holy Angels

BELMONT — A special American flag is flying atop the flagpole at Holy Angels, Inc. in Belmont.

The flag was flown over the U.S. Capitol in Washington, D.C. in December.

Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C. 10th District and a parishioner of St. Michael Church in Gastonia, secured the flag in honor of Holy Angels' 50th anniversary and the 50th birthday of Maria Morrow, Holy Angels' first resident.

The N.C. Air National Guard's 145th Airlift Wing Color Guard from Charlotte raised the flag at Holy Angels during an outdoor ceremony attended by Holy Angels residents, staff and community leaders Jan. 30.

"What an incredible honor to have received such a gift," said Regina Moody, Holy Angels president and CEO. "We are grateful to Rep. Patrick McHenry and his staff for securing this special American flag."

The Air National Guardsmen also raised a second flag bearing Holy Angels' 50th anniversary logo. Both flags will fly throughout the year.

Following the flag ceremony, residents and staff participated in a musical and a parade led by Morrow in her new customized golf car, a recent birthday gift. A ribbon-cutting ceremony of Holy Angels' new intermediate care facility was also a highlight of this day.

The ceremony, hosted by the Belmont Chamber of Commerce, re-opened the home, which underwent recent expansion to include an additional seven beds.

The events were the first of several to be held monthly at Holy Angels during its 50th anniversary year. In February, residents will begin moving into Moody Place, Holy Angels' newest children's home, which features an additional 15 beds.

Holy Angels was founded in 1956 by the Sisters of Mercy, beginning a much-needed specialized service for children and adults, some of whom are medically fragile with varying degrees of mental retardation and physical disabilities.

The 145th Airlift Wing's primary mission involves the delivery of supplies (food, medical, equipment), transport of troops and the evacuation of people in harm's way.

St. Gabriel parishioner semi-finalist for national honor

BY KAREN A. EVANS

STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — A parishioner of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte may soon achieve national recognition for his humanitarian work in the Diocese of Charlotte and in his native country.

Wally Penilla, a native of Lopez, Quezon, Philippines, was nominated for the Filipino Hero in America award by the Filipino-American Community of the Carolinas in acknowledgment of his countless hours of service.

Over the past 10 years, Wally has served more than 30,000 meals work at the Uptown Men's Shelter in Charlotte and has inspired hundreds of like-minded volunteers.

In addition to his volunteer work in Charlotte, Penilla has coordinated fundraising for Answering the Call of the Poor (ANCOP), an organization that builds homes in the Philippines through its parent organization, Gawad Kalinga.

ANCOP provides housing for the "poorest of the poor" — the homeless, squatters and displaced persons — in the Philippines, Penilla said. The program is similar to Habitat for Humanity, in that the future homeowners must contribute man hours to the construction of their home.

Gawad Kalinga, which in English means, "to give care," is an alternative solution to the problem of poverty not just in the Philippines, but the world. Its approach is integrated, holistic and sustainable — a concrete action plan to rebuild the Philippines. ANCOP is the network of international organizations that supports the work of Gawad Kalinga.

So far, Penilla's fundraising efforts have resulted in enough money to build 30 houses — $30,000. He has also spearheaded efforts to raise money to purchase computers for schools in the Philippines.

Penilla often takes groups of teenagers to the men's shelter to prepare and serve meals.

"The homeless shelter makes a difference for the kids who volunteer,"

Wally Penilla sits with his wife, Merly (center) and the interviewer delegate from the Ugat Foundation in the Philippines.

Penilla said.

Penilla said the work the teenagers do the shelter is mutually beneficial. They help the poor of Charlotte, while at the same time their eyes are opened to the conditions in which others live. He said the children of immigrants are especially affected.

"They get a different perspective — it's a different kind of poverty than they experience," he said. "Their eyes are opened to see that they are blessed."

Penilla and his family came to the United States in 1978, and have lived in Charlotte for the past 20 years.

"We have to repay what we've received from this country," said Penilla. "My work is just a small way of contributing."

The Filipino Hero in America award is one of the Bayaning Pilipino Awards, which pay tribute to the values of humanitarianism, industry, determination and dedication to public service demonstrated by Filipino in the Philippines, Middle East and Asia-Pacific regions and the United States.

"I'm uncomfortable with the nomination," Penilla said. "There are lots of folks who do more than I do."

What's The Road Like Ahead?

The road we have to travel is different for each of us. The only certainty is that we all must end the journey some day.

If you take the time to prepare for that journey's end now, your family, favorite parish, school and diocesan ministry will be supported. A will is an essential part of that overall plan for your life's journey.

lives — working, going to school, participating in sports and worshipping in their church.

At a Sunday evening Mass in January, Kessler and Guthlein were the only two servers, assisting the newly assigned parochial vicar, Oblate Father Paul Dechant, at one of his first Masses at the parish.

Guthlein has been serving Mass at St. Paul the Apostle Church the past two years. Widman and Kessler have served at two Masses each, although Kessler also served at her church in Florida before moving to Greensboro with her parents.

"When Richard expressed interest (in becoming an altar server) and I asked for extra training for him, the parish was very supportive," Lynda Guthlein-Garguilo, Guthlein's sister said. "He is treated no differently than other servers."

"I like helping in God's presence," said Guthlein.

"I like to be with God and to help others," said Kessler about serving at the altar.

Kessler and Widman's parents and Guthlein's sister and brother-in-law all supported their family member's decision to become altar servers.

"Including Adam in our family has been easy, and having him be included in our community has been relatively easy," said Widman's father, Ed. "Having people in the parish develop expectations of him is where being an altar server is helping him to be included (in the parish)."

Being altar servers isn't the only way these three special people are showing that Down syndrome isn't a roadblock to achieving their goals in life.

All three compete in the Special Olympics, and Kessler serves on the board of directors for Special Olympics North Carolina.

Kessler has competed in the Special Olympics since 1984, and has won several medals. Most recently, she took gold, silver and bronze medals in Alpine skiing events at the 2005 games in Nagano, Japan.

Widman attends Ragsdale High School in nearby Jamestown, where he serves as the Flying Tigers mascot during the football season.

Guthlein is a third-degree Knight of Columbus. He has been a member of the Knights of Columbus for the past four years.

Guthlein and Kessler also work part time at grocery stores in Greensboro.

The inherent value of all people, including those with disabilities, is an important pro-life issue in the Catholic Church.

Speaking at a 1989 international symposium on Down syndrome, Pope John Paul II criticized the "selective abortion" of handicapped children, declaring that the "search for genuine social progress" cannot ignore God's law.

The late pope praised scientists who continue to seek to understand Down syndrome despite a shortage of funds. He also lauded healthcare workers for helping people with Down syndrome to "overcome the limitations brought on by their illness."

The families of people with Down syndrome particularly know their value, he added.

"You, more than anyone, know that, despite their handicaps, these children are worthy of loving care, and readily give so much affection in return," said Pope John Paul II.

French Catholic geneticist, Vatican appointee, one of discoverers of Down syndrome

Doctor also ardent defender of life

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

PARIS — Dr. Jerome Lejeune, a French geneticist, was internationally known for his staunch support of pro-life causes. The Catholic physician and researcher was one of the three discoverers of the extra chromosome that causes Down syndrome.

Following his death in 1994, Pope John Paul II said Lejeune was "one of the ardent defenders of life, especially the life of unborn infants."

Lejeune had been a member of the papally appointed Pontifical Academy of Sciences since 1974. In March 1993, he was named president of the newly created Pontifical Academy for Life.

Lejeune was a strong opponent of abortion and unrestricted experimentation on human embryos. He advocated strong laws to strictly control the use of medical technology and experimentation on humans from the embryo stage onward.

In an interview in November 1993, he said the danger in medical technological advances is not progress but the attitude of some doctors and scientists who think that technology has given them the power to create human beings and thus the power to create and destroy human life.

"We have human rights laws. Now we need laws on the right to be human," he said.

"Science cannot tell between good and evil," said Lejeune. Having the "extraordinary power of playing with tiny human beings or even with grown-ups" requires the need "to be told by authority what is good," he said.

Lejeune often criticized experiments on human embryos as unnecessary.

Claims that embryonic research would help solve problems such as Down syndrome, muscular dystrophy and hemophilia "were not based on science," he said in 1986.

To study such diseases, scientists would have to experiment on human fetuses, not embryos, he said. Lejeune said the term "embryo" applies to the first two months after conception and "fetus" applies to the remaining seven months of life "in utero," he said.

Bishop McGuinness students rally, march for life

Students from Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville take part in the March for Life outside the U.S. Supreme Court in Washington, D.C., Jan. 23.

Thousands of youths attend pro-life events

BY ANTON VOROZHKO
SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

WASHINGTON, D.C. — More than 130 students from Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville were among the estimated 25,000 young Catholics from across the nation gathered at the MCI Center for this year's Rally for Life and Youth Mass before the March for Life in Washington, D.C., Jan. 23.

The events are held to protest the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion on demand.

"I went before being pro-life is a huge part of my faith, and my faith is a big part of who I am," said Jennifer Eklund, a Bishop McGuinness senior.

The March for Life "makes you think about how bad abortion is and it was amazing seeing all of the priests and religious," said freshman Sean Cary.

It was after a long procession of priests and bishops that Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington finally made it to the altar at the sports arena.

"Only when you have a national championship do you fill this hall with as many people as we have today," the cardinal said.

"And that makes sense because you are the champions of life."

The MCI Center was filled to capacity. Many youths and their chaperons were turned away, and so walked down the street to attend a Mass at St. Patrick's Church, which was also packed to capacity.

Cardinal McCarrick was joined at the altar by 100 priests and 21 of his fellow bishops, including Cardinal William H. Keeler of Baltimore, chairman of the bishops' pro-life committee; Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia, elected in November 2005 to become the committee's chairman this November; and Bishop Paul S. Loverde of Arlington, Va.

Ending the Mass, the cardinal echoed Pope Benedict XVI's words at his installation Mass last April: "The church is alive and the church is young."

After Mass, the young people walked from the sports arena to the Mall for the march.

Bishop McGuinness' campus ministry has taken students to the March for Life for the past five years. This year, 133 students made the pilgrimage to Washington.

The night before the march, the students joined more than 6,000 people many of them high school and college students — for the National Prayer Vigil for Life at the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington.

The people filled every inch of the basilica's upper church, including the side chapels, and its lower Crypt Church. Closed-circuit televisions around the basilica beamed the Mass to those without a direct view of it.

The opening procession took about a half-hour, as did the recessional; the clergymen, walking two by two, were barely able to get through the crowd. Distribution of Communion took more than 30 minutes.

"We gather in this sacred space to bear witness yet again to the terrible cloud that has darkened our nation since the Supreme Court declared 33 years ago today that the life of a human being, a life created in God's image, may be ended before its birth," said Cardinal Keeler, the main celebrant and homilist.

"We come together to pray that this darkest of clouds might at last be lifted. We come together again to pray for the

Roe Reality Check

BELOW ARE MORE MYTHS VS. REALITIES REGARDING ROE V. WADE AND ABORTION, TAKEN FROM "ROE REALITY CHECK" ON THE U.S. BISHOPS' WEB SITE, WWW.USCCB.ORG.

Myth: "High Court rules abortions legal the first three months."

Fact: Abortion is legal through all nine months of pregnancy.

Despite the Jan. 23, 1973 claim by the New York Times that Roe v. Wade made abortion in the first three months of pregnancy legal, the Supreme Court ruled in Roe v. Wade that abortion may not be restricted at all in the first trimester. In the second trimester abortion may be regulated only for the mother's health.

After "viability," abortion may be prohibited except where necessary to preserve the mother's health.

Roe's companion case, Doe v. Bolton, defined maternal "health" as: "all factors — physical, emotional, psychological, familial, and the woman's age — relevant to the well-being of the patient."

Thus, abortion is legal and cannot be prohibited in the seventh, eighth or ninth months of pregnancy if any of these reasons is invoked.

"[N]o significant legal barriers of any kind whatsoever exist today in the United States for a woman to obtain an abortion for any reason during any stage of her pregnancy." (S. Rep. No. 98-149, at 6 (1983)).

Myth: Most Americans favor abortion.
Fact: Most Americans actually oppose it.

A recent Harris Interactive poll states 52% of Americans favor Roe v. Wade and 47% oppose it. But the poll describes Roe as "the U.S. Supreme Court decision making abortions up to three months of pregnancy legal."

That's wrong. The fact is, Roe made abortion legal through all 9 months of pregnancy.

In the same poll, 72% of Americans said abortion should be illegal in the second three months of pregnancy; 86% said it should be illegal in the last three months.

Even support for abortion in the first three months is open to question. In a 2004 Zogby International poll, 61% of Americans said abortion should not be permitted after the fetal heartbeat has begun. This occurs in the first month.

So why do 52% of Americans say they favor Roe v. Wade? Because they don't really know what Roe did.

triumph of life," he said.

Diocesan, national schools celebrate Catholic Schools Week

"The theme was celebrated and lived throughout our 18 schools in a variety of events," said Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools.

Events included student appreciation days, volunteer appreciation days, special Masses, guest speakers and community outreach activities.

"From the all-MACS (Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools) family Mass at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, to eucharistic adoration at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville to the delivery of breakfast to fire and police departments by students at Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point, something memorable happened at every school," said Cherry.

This year-round program is a collaborative undertaking by the National Catholic Educational Association (NCEA) and the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops (USCCB).

Dominican Sister Glenn Anne McPhee, secretary for education at USCCB, said the theme of "Character. Compassion. Values" reinforces concepts that are part and parcel of every Catholic school.

"Schools live by and pass on values; they develop character and show compassion for every student," she said.

Many Catholic schools in the Gulf region suffered serious damage in the hurricanes, said Karen Ristau, NCEA president.

"True to their (school) character, most of them have reopened," she said. "Other students across the nation contributed more than $1 million in a child-to-child relief effort, demonstrating that their compassion and values are enduring."

Several Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charlotte accepted more than 30 students displaced by the hurricanes.

"The values instilled by parents as the first educators of their children in the faith are re-enforced in our Catholic schools," said Cherry. "The compassion for others — within their own classrooms, schools, local communities and the world — has been shown, most recently through the schools' outreach to the families displaced by Hurricane Katrina."

"The character of each school is reflected in the character exhibited by the students who attend and the parents who support it, as well as the teachers, administrators and staff members," she said.

National Appreciation Day was established to encourage supporters nationwide to showcase the great accomplishments and contributions of Catholic schools to the country.

That day in Washington, a delegation of more than 150 Catholic school students, teachers and parents visited Capitol Hill to meet with congressional leaders to promote Catholic schools.

As part of their marathon day, they hand-delivered letters from chief administrators of Catholic education to their representatives and provide background information on Catholic schools to every congressional office.

Daniel Curtin, executive director of NCEA's Chief Administrators of Catholic Education, said distributing letters from superintendents gives Catholic leaders an opportunity to tell Congress about the Catholic schools in their communities.

"Many of our superintendents use this initiative as a timely reminder to reach congressional leaders directly with a united message about our priorities for Catholic education," he said.

Some of those letters were written by principals, parents and students in the Diocese of Charlotte, as well as by Cherry.

"All of our letters were hand-delivered to our Congressional representatives by someone from NCEA on that day," said Cherry.

NCEA is the largest private, professional education association in the world. Founded in 1904, the association's membership represents more than 200,000 educators serving 7.6 million students at all levels of Catholic education.

Keeping dreams alive

Mayor Terry Bellamy of Asheville talks to students about following their dreams at Asheville Catholic School Jan. 30 as part of the Catholic Schools Week celebration.

Asheville mayor relays good advice to students

BY CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — Never give up on your dreams.

That was the message given to Catholic students by Terry Bellamy, Asheville's first female African American mayor.

Bellamy visited Asheville Catholic School Jan. 30 as part of the Catholic Schools Week celebration. Other guest speakers included representatives of outreach programs served by the students throughout the year.

Against a backdrop of students' pictures portraying their lives and experiences at Asheville Catholic, Bellamy spoke about her own dream of becoming mayor.

"Nothing beats a 'can't' but a 'try,'" she said. "I believed it was my destiny to be mayor."

She encouraged students to keep journals, recalling how she kept one when she ran for mayor while serving as the youngest, and only African-American, member on Asheville's city council. Using Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s "What is Your Life's Blueprints?" speech as a guide, Bellamy said her journal detailed her positive and negative aspects.

"What do you want to do with yourself? How will you get there?" she asked the students.

On her desk, she said, is a sign that simply reads, "Dream."

She recalled how two teachers and a counselor were her "meanest" supporters, always encouraging her to do better.

They "wouldn't let me sleep in class" and "were hard on me and didn't accept excuses," she said.

Teachers, said Bellamy, should do all they can to encourage and inspire students, noting she does not remember her teachers who were lenient.

After the speakers, students watched a slideshow depicting a year in the life of Asheville Catholic School. The student outreach program includes visiting with and making cards for local nursing home residents and helping out in area schools.

Other activities to celebrate Catholic Schools Week included a middle school science fair; a student-teacher appreciation day; a volunteer appreciation day; and a Mass celebrated by Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and vice chancellor, and concelebrated by Father John Schneider, pastor of St. Eugene Church in Asheville.

Eucharistic adoration, prayer stressed by priest

KERNERSVILLE — Spending time before the Blessed Sacrament is a crucial part of a student's life.

Father Antoine Thomas, a priest of the Community of St. John in Peoria, Ill., relayed that message at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville Feb. 3. Father Thomas' visit was part of the Catholic Schools Week celebration.

Father Thomas, founder of Children of Hope, a children's eucharistic adoration program being implemented in parishes around the country, was a featured speaker at the Diocese of Charlotte's first Eucharistic Congress in September 2005.

During Mass, Father Thomas urged the students to make and spend time before the Blessed Sacrament and pray, regardless of how busy their lives may get. He challenged them to lead "vertical lives" — lives that will lead them to heaven.

After Mass, Father Thomas led groups of students in eucharistic adoration, spending time in silence and prayer in the school chapel.

"This day was truly a celebration of our faith and of the treasure that Catholic schools are," said Anton Vorozhko, assistant campus minister.

"Experiences like these are the ones that allow our youths to see that there is more to life than what our culture offers, that they were created for the glory of heaven," said Vorozhko.

Vatican says freedom of expression does not mean offending religions

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican, commenting on a series of satirical newspaper cartoons that have outraged Muslims, said freedom of expression does not include the right to offend religious sentiments.

At the same time, the Vatican said, violent reactions are equally deplorable.

"Intolerance — wherever it comes from, whether real or verbal, action or reaction — always constitutes a serious threat to peace," Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said Feb. 4.

The cartoons, which make fun of the prophet Mohammed, were first published in a Danish newspaper last fall and have recently been reprinted in several European papers.

Islamic anger has grown, along with popular demonstrations. In early February protesting Muslims burned or vandalized Western embassy buildings in Indonesia, Syria and Lebanon.

The Vatican statement said "freedom of thought or expression ... cannot imply a right to offend the religious sentiments of believers," no matter what the religion.

Certain forms of ridicule or extreme criticism can constitute an "unacceptable provocation," the Vatican said.

It said governments and their institutions cannot be held responsible for the offensive actions of an individual or a newspaper. Violent protests never reflect "the true spirit of any religion," it said.

The Vatican suggested, however, that where free speech crosses the line and becomes offensive to a religion, national authorities "can and should" intervene.

The cartoons are considered blasphemous because Islam does not allow depictions of Mohammed, and they show Mohammed in a number of disrespectful ways. One cartoon, for example, shows Mohammed in a turban shaped as a bomb.

In separate statements, two Vatican officials also denounced the cartoons.

Archbishop Michael Fitzgerald, president of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, said the ongoing demonstrations show how deeply Muslims have been offended.

"This is very important for them and therefore cannot be the object of derision or ridicule," he said.

The archbishop added that violent reactions to such offenses are not justified.

Cardinal Achille Silvestrini, a leader in the Vatican's diplomatic service, said the cartoons demonstrated a growing trend to make fun of religious symbols.

"Freedom of satire that offends the sentiments of others becomes an abuse — and in this case it has affected the sentiments of entire populations in their highest symbols," he said.

The cardinal said Christianity has similar sensitivities.

"One can understand satire about a priest but not about God. With reference to Islam, we could understand satire on the uses and customs and behavior, but not about the Quran, Allah and the Prophet," he said.

The cardinal said secular societies should not assume a right to offend religious sentiments. He noted that many countries consider it illegal to offend their national flag and asked, "Shouldn't we consider religious symbols on an equal level with the symbols of secular institutions?"

Msgr. Aldo Giordano, general secretary of the Council of European Bishops' Conferences, said this type of satire was a type of vulgarity that goes against human rights. But he said it was important not to overreact and "not make it an occasion for a clash of civilizations."

"We should be able to transform offenses in an occasion of greater solidarity," he said.

God's message of love, forgiveness holds true

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

If you were going to be shipwrecked on a desert island, what three books would you take with you?

In various games and interviews a participant must answer this familiar question. Of course, there are thousands of possibilities; however, one of the three most popular selections is the Bible.

I never have forgotten one person's reply in an interview I attended. When questioned about his choice, he answered: "I'd never be bored with the Bible. I'd discover something new each time I read it. The greatest stories of human failure and forgiveness are in it."

Fortunately, most of us have never been condemned to live on the proverbial deserted island with our chosen books. However, the messages of God's grace and forgiveness that wait between the covers of the Bible have the power to do more than entertain or inform us.

The living words of God have the power to sustain and heal in the realms of modern culture as well as they did in the ancient world.

Our first reading from the prophet Isaiah was composed more than 2,600 years ago and recounts times when God's people broke their covenant relationship with God with some regularity. Each broken relationship Isaiah enumerates in this reading ended in suffering and destruction.

Nevertheless, among the turmoil of broken promises a faithful remnant of believers endured and did not lose sight of the God who had called them.

When Isaiah begins his passage with "thus says the Lord," we know it is a cue to pay particular attention to the message. The Lord's communication is a surprising one. It is not a communique of retribution filled with hell-fire and damnation, but a command that urges God's people to leave the past in the past and accept the bountiful, unmerited gift of forgiveness.

On this new day, the Lord is wiping the slate clean and asking the people to remember not the long ago, but to embrace the fact that God is doing something new.

The days of Isaiah the prophet are long past; however, when we hear the Gospel proclaimed and celebrate the Eucharist, we encounter the ultimate gift of reconciliation, forgiveness and love: Jesus.

Portraying a saint

'Bernadette' star promotes film's sequel as it debuts in U.S.

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Soap opera fans may know Sydney Penny from her current role as Julia on the ABC soap opera "All My Children," her two-year stint on the CBS soap "The Bold and the Beautiful" that ended last year, or a couple of other daytime dramas.

But a small — and, in the hopes of promoters, growing — group of film fans think of her most fondly from a pair of movies that never got a theatrical release in the United States.

Penny, 34, played St. Bernadette in the French-language film "Bernadette" released in 1988. The film was finally issued stateside last year, but only on a direct-to-video basis.

She also starred as the saint a year later in a sequel, known in English as "The Passion of Bernadette." Like "Bernadette," it is not being released in theaters, but Ignatius Press, which is distributing both films, has lined up church screenings beginning in February for "The Passion of Bernadette."

A screening will be held at St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton Feb. 11.

And Penny, when on breaks from the "All My Children" taping schedule, is helping promote the movie.

"The Passion of Bernadette" is "a buried treasure because it was only in French," Penny said. "The distributors were shaky: It's a slice of life of an iconic religious figure. They wondered whether there would be an appeal to a larger audience."

To Penny, the answer is yes.

"(It's) not just (for) Catholics or people who specifically grew up with Bernadette or had her story in their consciousness," she said. "It's a story about a woman a much wider audience can appreciate. It really is an interesting story to me. It gives the final portrait — a fuller portrait — of her life."

The original "Bernadette" focused on the saint's early life.

"I think that when they had the first film (finished) that Jean Delannoy (the director and co-writer) had wanted to make a sequel," said Penny, who is a Protestant. "He was much more passionate about her life in the convent, but the first film had to be made to pave the way for the second film."

"He was so extremely passionate about telling the story is why the film got made in the first place," she said.

According to Penny, the films are still popular in some sections of France, where they were filmed.

"These have had two separate lives. They were released in Europe, and in the case of the first film, it's played all the time in Lourdes and also comes on television, always on Easter time," she said.

With more than a dozen acting credits on her resume, why promote a film made in the 1980s?

"I'm really pleased and curious to see people's responses, and it allows me to be part of a community that this means something to ... and I'm not referring to my work in particular, but the coming together of audience and director and actress and crew to see the fruition of what we've done," she said.

Penny will go to Wilmington, N.C., to do a personal appearance at St. Mary Church when "The Passion of Bernadette" has a screening there.

"I'm really fond of the town," she said. "I own a house there, so I spend a lot of time there when I'm not working. I've done a film there. I was queen of the azalea festival one year!"

Although in the first year of a three-year contract to star on "All My Children," Penny had time to film "Hidden Places," a Depression-era, romantic drama playing on cable's Hallmark Channel.

"It's a very lovely film, great for family viewing and all age ranges," Penny said. "You could watch it with your grandma and your 4-year-old daughter."

WANT TO WATCH?

"The Passion of Bernadette" will be shown at St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton at 3 p.m. and 7 p.m. Feb. 11. Call (828) 437-3108 for more info.

Refurbished chapel features unique art

Catholic Reflection Center, now named the Chapel of Our Mother of Good Counsel.

"Mary is honored under many names," Augustinian Father Francis J. Doyle said. "We Augustinians honor her especially as Our Mother of Good Counsel because she is the mother of Jesus, who is our good counsel."

Father Doyle, pastor of St. Margaret of Scotland Church and a staff member at Living Waters in Maggie Valley, spoke to parishioners assembled at Living Waters, adjacent to the church, for the naming ceremony Jan. 29.

"It's very appropriate that here at the reflection center, where people come for wisdom and counseling, we name the chapel for Our Mother of Good Counsel," he said.

Revealing history

Jan. 29 was chosen for the naming to coincide with the anniversary of Pope John XXIII's announcing the Second Vatican Council on Jan. 25, 1959. The pope prayed at the shrine of Our Mother of Good Counsel in Genazzano, Italy, in August 1959 that Mary would guide the Catholic Church's renewal.

That church, originally called St.

Mary of Good Counsel, was in ruins when Augustinian friars undertook its care and restoration in 1356. The image, known today as Our Mother of Good Counsel, was part of a larger fresco, probably painted between 1417 and 1431.

At some point the fresco was covered with plaster. Over it hung a terracotta figure of Our Mother of Good Counsel.

The friars began restoring the church in 1467. Soon the original image reappeared. A stone ledge being inserted into the wall cracked the plaster and revealed Fabriano's fresco, which was soon known as Our Mother of Good Counsel.

According to information from the Augustinians:

"One striking aspect of the fresco ... is that the upper portion of the image is separated from the wall so that much of the fresco is just a thin sheet of plaster. Yet the image of Our [Mother] of Good Counsel has survived for centuries in this precarious state, through the rebuilding of the main walls of the church, through a number of earthquakes, and even through the aerial bombardment of Genazzano during World War II."

Recapturing the image

Living Waters' stained-glass panel, created by St. Margaret of Scotland parishioners Al Triunfo and Ron and Terri Van Dyck, is based on early images of Our Mother of Good Counsel, with one difference: mountains.

"In all the pictures there was no background," Terri Van Dyck said. "So I asked Father (Doyle) if it would be OK to put mountains in the background because we live in the mountains."

Triunfo cut the stained glass shapes: purple and green for mountains and trees, blue for sky, blue and red for Mary's mantle and gown, white for Jesus' infant dress, gold and amber for halos.

Terri Van Dyck, a professional porcelain and stained-glass artist, painted the faces and hands, then fired the pieces in her kiln to fuse the paint to the glass.

Triunfo and Van Dyck worked together to assemble the glass pieces; Ron Van Dyck built the frame.

Although Triunfo has worked with stained glass most of his life, this project "was different," he said. "I was able to put her (Terri's) artistic abilities with my craft."

And making the image "meant a lot to me," Terri Van Dyck added. "I've always had a deep devotion to Mary. I would talk to her: 'Mother Mary, this is in honor of you. Please help Al and me to do this in honor of you.'"

Enhanced surroundings

Hanging the panel completed the chapel's refurbishment. Improvements include new carpet donated by the Augustinian Province of St. Thomas of Villanova, to which three of the Augustinians in Haywood County belong.

The chapel's new altar and other marble furnishings came from St. Margaret of Scotland Church.

Like Petruccia, who so many years ago helped to restore the church in Genazzano, St. Margaret of Scotland parishioners have helped to improve their church and Living Waters. Capital improvements at Living Waters, including new carpet in the conference room, are the result of contributions by individuals, both Catholic and non-Catholic, and through the stewardship of other parishes in the diocese.

Several years ago, Ron Van Dyck created St. Margaret of Scotland Church's blond oak baptismal font in memory of his youngest son, Barry. Over the next couple of years, parishioners donated materials for other oak church furnishings, including the ambo, paschal-candle holder, tabernacle surround, and the corbel to hold the sanctuary lamp.

The original marble altar remained.

With more parishioner donations, Ron Van Dyck created a new oak altar. Scott Roy of a nearby tile and stone company cut the center of the marble altar and inlaid the pieces in the oak altar. He fit the two remaining pieces of the altar top together and placed the new top back on the marble supports, now in the Living Waters chapel.

Roy, who is not Catholic, donated all labor for both projects.

The marble corbel that once held St. Margaret of Scotland Church's tabernacle now supports the chapel's tabernacle. The chapel's sanctuary lamp rests on its new shelf, formerly one of two holy water fonts in St. Margaret of Scotland Church.

Catechists explore mystagogy

mysteries of the faith that follows reception into the church.

"Mystagogy is meant to deepen the experience of initiation after the Easter Vigil," said Dr. Cris Villapando, director of programs for the diocesan Office of Faith Formation, which oversees the RCIA, and a member of the Diocesan Commission on the RCIA.

Father Varga, who holds a master's degree in theology and a doctorate in ministry from the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., serves as chairman of the liturgical commission for the Diocese of Bridgeport.

"Perhaps the most valuable lesson I learned today from Father Andrew Varga is that the task of the RCIA is not merely 'preparation to the font' but 'through the font,'" said Michelle Calascione, the new parish catechetical leader and RCIA coordinator for St William Church in Murphy.

Mystagogy is often interpreted by many initiation ministers to end on Pentecost, the feast commemorating the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the Apostles, which marked the start of the church's mission on earth.

The feast is observed on the seventh Sunday after Easter.

Father Varga explained that a 50-day period of mystagogy is not the vision of the rite because the four major tasks of mystagogy cannot be accomplished in 50 days, nor "calendared" into one school year.

The tasks of deepening one's grasp of the paschal mystery — making the Gospel part of one's life through meditation, sharing in the Eucharist and performing works of charity — are life-long tasks, he said.

As such, he said, the theme of mystagogy is neither the end of the RCIA process nor the end of the catechumen's journey.

Father Varga likened the passion of a catechumen — someone undergoing the formation process — to reach the end of mystagogy to that of a racehorse bolting toward the finish line. The "mystagogues" demonstrate that same eagerness to dart into the world, proclaiming the mission of Jesus Christ, he said.

"The significance of mystagogy for me is its power of conversion," said Villapando. "A momentous decision was made for Christ, and the community has to assist the neophyte (newly baptized) in the new life of discipleship. This discipleship involves prayer rooted in the Word, sacraments and charity."

There are two other common pitfalls that plague the proper implementation of mystagogy, said Father Varga.

The first is the "graduation mentality," analogous to what happens to people who finish their confirmation. The second is overeagerness on the part of RCIA coordinators to "sign up the neophytes for ministries" as some kind of an attempt to "cement" their ecclesial relationship.

Also, said Father Varga, mystagogy is the work of the entire faith community and not just the initiation team.

"If the initiation ministers took away that insight, and if they also linked mystagogy with lifetime discipleship formation, then the presentation was a success," said Villapando.

Cris Villapando and Editor Kevin E. Murray contributed to this story.

The Office of Faith Formation is one of the ministries supported by contributions to the Diocesan Support Appeal, an annual campaign in the Diocese of Charlotte that helps support 30 ministries that provide 50 programs. The 2006 DSA runs Feb. 4 to March 12.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Embedding faith in a news story

At times, participation can have dramatic effect

Journalists have a front row seat on history. At political events they are the last to arrive, yet they usually get the best vantage point. Press boxes at sporting events always serve food and drinks, all of it free. The trade-off is that the politicians and sporting teams get loads of free publicity.

There is an unspoken code among journalists who receive this largess — they don't participate in what is going on around them. They don't clap for the candidate, no matter how enthusiastic the crowd. They don't cheer for the home team that supplied the corndogs or prime rib.

Journalists are paid to watch, not to get involved.

When I worked as a television reporter, this professional disengagement allowed me to be less biased. But if the event were taking place in a Catholic church, I was conflicted between observing my faith and keeping a professional distance.

Now as communications director for the Diocese of Charlotte, I often escort reporters to Mass and other services. I don't hesitate to participate, but not surprisingly, most of the reporters I work with maintain an arm's-length demeanor. They stand and sit with the congregation, but they don't kneel during the liturgy of the Eucharist, don't join in prayer or song and don't receive holy Communion or even a blessing.

Except for a columnist named Tommy Tomlinson of The Charlotte Observer.

Tomlinson, who was a finalist for the Pulitzer Prize in 2005, has written a popular local column for the Observer since 1997. He was among eight reporters I escorted to a recent funeral Mass in Charlotte.

The story was tragically sad. Five-year-old twin girls were murdered, their father charged with the crime. The story generated a tremendous amount of interest in the community and the news media reported daily on whatever it could find that might shed an understanding light on the terribly sad deaths of two little girls.

At first the family shunned the media interest, but on the day of the funeral at St. Matthew Church, a decision was made to allow reporters, without their cameras, to attend and observe the liturgy. Unlike other events, the news media takes the back row at funerals.

Catholics & the Media

When the liturgy of the Eucharist began, Tomlinson surprised me by kneeling. Later, when Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor of St. Matthew Church, offered Communion, he invited non-Catholics to come forward for a blessing. Tomlinson, who isn't Catholic, got in line and crossed his arms.

Being "embedded" is a term that usually refers to a journalist who is traveling with soldiers in a war zone. It is refreshing to see that the concept also can have a more spiritual connotation.

Tomlinson later explained that being a reporter didn't prevent him from having strong feelings at the emotionally charged Mass.

"I wanted to know what it felt like to be in that line for the blessing," he said.

It wasn't first-person grandstanding, either. In his subsequent columns, he never made mention of his participation in the Mass. He did pay an eloquent tribute to the two young girls, their family and the faith that was so evident in the church.

He wrote, "You come to a funeral hoping to understand. But Tuesday there was no understanding. The singing and praying could not wash away the box at the center of St. Matthew Catholic Church, where Tessa and Sammie Crespi lay side by side under the lid. ... And while acknowledging that the deaths of Tessa and Sammie have provoked '10 thousand questions,' she (Mrs. Crespi) said people should think of her 'precious angels' as sacrificial lambs whose deaths dramatize the effects of mental illness."

Tomlinson demonstrated that the line between observing and participating can be fuzzy. His readers would understand, accepting it on faith, that through his involvement in the Mass he had their best interests at heart.

And besides, as he put it, "it never hurts to be blessed." Amen.

Expose the evil

Seeing is believing when it comes to abortion

I have spent more than half my life strategizing about how the people of God can most effectively fight, and end, abortion. There is no one line that summarizes my conclusions better than what St. Paul wrote in Ephesians 5:11: "Have nothing to do with the fruitless deeds of darkness, but rather expose them."

Evil flourishes when it is hidden; injustice festers when the victim is unseen. And history demonstrates that those who have overcome social injustices have followed Paul's advice to expose the evil.

For instance, those who fought the slave trade in Britain went to the ports to draw pictures of the boats and how the slaves were kept in them like sardines.

Exposing evil causes it to collapse under its own weight, as it confronts the light of human conscience. Overcoming injustice does not require that everyone believe it is injustice.

There is, rather, a critical mass at some point in the spectrum, when "enough" people are so convinced. The good news is that those people already have the conscience to reject the evil. The problem is that the evil hasn't been sufficiently exposed for them to see it.

So it is with abortion. The more it is exposed, the more people reject it.

Public opinion on abortion in America has been amazingly stable since Roe vs. Wade. The most significant shift occurred when the details of the partial-birth abortion procedure were exposed in the mid-90s. Never did a larger audience see and hear in more detail what abortion actually is.

Abortion needs to be exposed in five distinct ways:

— Statistics. Most Americans have no idea of the immense numbers of abortions, or that abortions occur throughout pregnancy. The abortion supporters themselves provide us the statistics.

See the Alan Guttmacher Institute's Web site, www.agi-usa.org. Just seeing these facts awakens many people that a change in abortion policy is necessary.

— Descriptions. Medical textbooks like Abortion Practice use the word

Guest Column

FATHER FRANK PAVONE
GUEST COLUMNIST

"decapitate" and "dismember" to describe what happens to the baby in abortion.

Moreover, there are now more sworn court testimonies from practicing abortionists than ever before, on all different abortion procedures (see www.priestsforlife.org/pba). Again, the abortionists' own words work against them. When we expose evil in this way, nobody can accuse us of making it up.

— Photos. Show people what abortion looks like, and they will never feel the same about it again. See how the photos impact people by reading their testimonies at www.priestsforlife.org/resources/abortionimages/graphicspraise.htm.

— Devastation to women, men and families. More and more mothers, fathers and families of aborted children speak out about how they have been devastated. The power of their testimony changes minds and hearts.

(See www.SilentNoMoreAwareness.org/testmonies.)

— Corruption in the abortion industry. Read the book "Lime 5" and see how malpractice, fraud and sexual abuse are rampant in legal abortion clinics.

See www.ClinicWorker.com to learn of other abuses and violations.

The road to ending abortion is clearly open in front of us. Simply take the evidence above and put it before the conscience of everyone you can.

Father Pavone is national director of Priests for Life.

Catholic Schools: Character, Compassion, Values

Catholic educators share in formation responsibility

I'll never forget her. I'll always be grateful for her goodness.

Sister Dionysia was small in stature but a giant of a woman. Although she was a brilliant teacher, her most memorable lessons were shared beyond the classroom.

I was a ninth-grader at Cathedral High School in Boston. Sister Dionysia was the homeroom teacher who taught both English and Latin. One day she pulled me aside and said, "Jimmy, stay after school and wait for me."

I couldn't help but wonder what she wanted. I hoped I hadn't done anything wrong. I was quite sure I wasn't in trouble.

When Sister Dionysia returned from the convent I noticed her carrying a Boston cream pie placed on a plate and enveloped by cellophane. Boy, did it look tempting.

"Jimmy, take this home to the housing project. You and your family will enjoy it for supper," she stated.

I'll never forget what followed. As she passed the plate to me somehow or another I missed the move and watched helplessly as her gracious gift fell to the floor. While looking at the mess of the broken dish and delicacy intertwined within the less than protective covering, I asked myself, "What do I do for an encore?"

As I bent down to retrieve the remnants of the pie, Sister Dionysia spoke those unforgettable words, "Don't worry, Jimmy, I'll get you another one." And she did!

Over the years since that memorable moment, I have enjoyed the privilege of speaking at numerous high school graduations. In every instance I've repeated the story of that after school experience.

Why? Because on that occasion, Sister Dionysia was both a teacher and a witness. The quality of her faith was exemplified by her spirit of generosity in giving and forgiving. Like Christ himself, she cared about me as a growing, maturing young man.

The theme of this year's Catholic Schools Week was "Catholic Schools: Character. Compassion. Values." It emphasizes the fact that the Catholic school is a unique setting within which the Catholic Church's educational mission is exercised.

While it is true that each of the curricula within the school is important, it must be remembered that the most basic curriculum is the environment within which learning and relating take place. The role of the teacher is not simply to share information but to participate in the process of formation.

The teacher is to be attentive to the timely development of the cognitive, affective, attitudinal and behavioral dimensions of the learner. The teacher is to be a truly Christian character who exemplifies and enables in others values, including that of compassion, that are essential for the maturing believer.

Many of my high school classmates and I gathered last April to celebrate the 50th anniversary of our graduation. During the meal, we shared experiences that were etched deep in our memories.

Sister Dionysia's name was mentioned with affection and gratitude time and again. She, such a faithful disciple of Jesus, had invited and enabled so many of us to be and become truly Christian characters who would appreciate, assimilate and share the values of the risen Lord.

She was a true Catholic educator.

Thank the Lord that her story is reflective of the selfless service of so many who have succeeded her as Catholic educators.

When troubles arise, seek Jesus' help in prayer, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

God's justice primarily aimed at freeing people from sin, says pope

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — When troubles arise in life or temptations appear, it is best not to try to figure out why, but to seek Jesus' help in prayer, said Pope Benedict XVI.

At his weekly general audience Feb. 8, the pope quoted the advice of a sixth-century desert monk, St. Barsanuphius of Gaza, who advised another monk not to fear trouble and temptation or to worry about their source, but to hold fast to the Lord.

Departing from his prepared text, the pope said, "These words ... are valid for us in our daily difficulties, problems, temptations."

"Do not try to conduct a theoretical reflection about their source, but do something positive: Invoke the Lord," the pope told an estimated 8,000 people overflowing the Vatican's audience hall.

In the face of struggle, the pope said, "Cry out to Jesus, 'Jesus, help me.' We are certain he will hear us because he is near to those who seek him."

"Let us not be discouraged, but let us run toward him, certain that we will reach the goal of our lives, Jesus the lord," Pope Benedict said.

The pope's audience talk focused on Psalm 145 and its recognition of God both as lord of the all the universe and as a loving father particularly concerned for the poor and the weak.

"God expresses his kingship by bending down to his most fragile and defenseless creatures," the pope said.

God's justice, which includes judgment, is primarily aimed at freeing people from sin and saving them, he said.

Pope Benedict said the psalm also lists the basic characteristics of a true believer: "He invokes the Lord in trusting prayer; seeks him in life with a sincere heart; fears his God, respecting his will and obeying his word; but, most of all, loves him, certain of being welcomed under the mantle of his protection."

The church's position on the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act

Q. Please explain the position of the church on the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act. What is it? Is it ethical and moral to offer one's body parts, or entire bodies, for transplant or medical research before or after death? How do you arrange to be a donor? (New Jersey)

A. It is morally lawful, and can be a generous act of charity, to donate one's organs or body tissues to persons who need them. Numerous parts of our anatomy, including bone, heart valves, skin and cornea, and major organs, can make the difference between life and death for thousands of people.

Body parts for transplant or research in medical care and science today. Though medical schools rely increasingly on models that simulate most major human physiological structures and functions, my understanding is that actual human bodies still provide advantages that other possibilities do not.

Some years ago, Pope John Paul II spoke of the shortage of donors for patients awaiting transplants. It is a matter of Christian generosity, he said, and "no solution will be forthcoming without a renewed sense of human solidarity" based on Christ's example, which can "inspire men and women to make great sacrifices in the service of others" (April 30, 1990).

This just makes good human and Christian sense, of course. Over a lifetime of love and sacrifice, we help each other all the time. If something that has been ours in life can still do good for someone else, before or after death, why not?

In one way or another, countless people have given us part of their lives already. Without these we would not be alive today. If science allows us to extend the gift of our bodies even after death, it is something to be grateful for and to use thoughtfully but generously.

The ethics of a specific transplant procedure may become complicated, since it must deal with several considerations: the determination of death, if donating the organ depends on the donor's death; physical consequences for the donor if the donor is living; degree of hope for a successful transplant; proportionate balance between the physical and psychological danger to the donor and the benefit for the recipient; informed consent, and so on.

Amid today's legal battles over such issues as assisted suicide, the Catechism of the Catholic Church appropriately points out that it is morally unacceptable to directly cause a disabling mutilation or death of a human being, even if that might help, or delay the death of, another person (No. 2296).

I believe you would be wise to discuss your desires with your family, and consider their feelings as well, before you make a decision.

The National Commission on Uniform State Laws published the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act in 1968 to provide a uniform legal environment for this "new frontier in modern medicine." All 50 states and the District of Columbia have adopted it.

A Uniform Donor Card providing for the gift of one's organs to a living person who needs them or all of one's body for education and research may be obtained from Living Bank, Box 6725, Houston, TX 77265.

Many regional centers also exist, and most states have donor forms attached to their driver's licenses. Funeral directors can usually supply more specific local information.

Young women live out reality of contemplative life as Poor Clares

BY JEAN M. SCHILDZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ST. LOUIS — It's hard to imagine young women of today choosing a life of enclosure, silence and prayer.

But three happy, healthy young women — all in their 20s — are now in formation at the Monastery of St. Clare in St. Louis. Each heard God's call and chose to be a Poor Clare.

Sister Mary Therese of the Sacred Heart Lavery, 26, entered the Poor Clares in 2001. The former Texas A&M University engineering student learned about the monastic community on a "nun run," in which young women discerning a vocation visit several religious orders in a set period of time.

Sister Mary Christiana of Our Eucharistic King Schwent, 20, entered the monastery in September 2004. She learned of the Poor Clares through her youth group; her mother and a young priest also encouraged her vocation.

Sister Mary Joseph of the Hearts of Jesus and Mary Rieger, 27, arrived in October 2004. The University of Missouri-Columbia political science graduate, who once worked as an intern on George W. Bush's 2000 presidential campaign, hadn't even known there were Poor Clares in the St. Louis Archdiocese until a close friend led her to them.

The three differ in personalities, looks and backgrounds. But what is impossible to miss is the one thing they share in abundance: a joyfulness of spirit.

These young women have given up everything that the secular world claims is needed to be happy, and yet they couldn't be happier. Are they somehow different from other people?

Poor Clare nuns (from left) Sister Mary Joseph of the Hearts of Jesus and Mary Rieger; Mother Mary Leo Hoffmann, abbess of the community; Sister Mary Christiana of Our Eucharistic King Schwent; and Sister Mary Therese of the Sacred Heart Lavery enjoy a lighthearted moment at the St. Clare Monastery in St. Louis in early January. The four nuns in the cloistered community are all in their 20s.

Not at all, said Poor Clare Mother Mary Leo Hoffmann, abbess of the 12-member cloistered community.

"We are ordinary women, but we've just been called to an extraordinary vocation," she said.

The Poor Clares carry on traditions handed down to them more than eight centuries ago by St. Clare of Assisi. They take vows of poverty, chastity, obedience and enclosure, promising to remain within the confines of the monastery.

The nuns meet and speak with visitors from behind a grille, or partition, which physically separates them from the outside world. Even when their families come to see them, which is permitted four times a year, they remain in enclosure.

Their main ministry is prayer. They constantly pray for others and gladly accept prayer requests. Their prayer lives include frequent adoration of the Eucharist, praying the rosary and private meditation.

The nuns follow a simple rule of silence. They are allowed to speak when it is necessary; otherwise, they keep silent throughout the day. During one recreational period daily, and on special occasions, they are free to talk.

Immersed in prayer, their days also are filled with caring for each other, chores, sewing — including making their own habits — music, cooking, studying the Catholic faith and helping to support themselves through the making of altar bread.

They don't eat meat. They don't use the Internet. They don't watch television, listen to the radio or read secular newspapers. One member scans the daily news to keep her fellow nuns informed of major events.

People who learn about their cloistered lives often ask how they can give up everything. Those who ask that question are looking at the situation from a worldly point of view, Mother Mary Leo said, and consequently would not be able to live in this way.

But these young women, she said, "have been touched by God's grace. They enjoy those things just as much as anyone else, but they see something deeper and of greater value than what the world is offering to them."

Sisters Mary Therese, Mary Christiana and Mary Joseph laughed and teased each other as they talked about their monastic lives. They leave no doubt they love what they do.

Some people think you have to be a saint to be a cloistered nun, but that is also not true, they said.

Explained Sister Mary Christiana: "He doesn't call the qualified; he qualifies the called."

The enclosure's purpose, they said, has more to do with keeping the world out than keeping in its occupants. It helps them to concentrate on what God intended and be totally devoted to him.

"It's so much harder to stay in a cloister than to leave," Sister Mary Joseph said. "You can always leave."

PILGRIMS FROM DIOCESE MEET POPE AT VATICAN

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY

CHARLOTTE — For Doris Blackwell, meeting the pope was the surprise of her life. "I never expected that to happen. I still can't believe it," she said.

Blackwell was one of more than 60 pilgrims, most from the Diocese of Charlotte, on the "Journey of Faith" pilgrimage through Italy.

The pilgrims joined Father Frank O'Rourke, former pastor of Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro now on sabbatical overseas, who invited people from the parishes at which he has served on the six-day pilgrimage through Italy.

BELMONT — College students from all reaches of the diocese recently gave away their hearts and time in the service of others.

The students gathered for the third annual "Give Your Heart Away" community service weekend Feb. 10-12. The retreat was sponsored by the diocesan Catholic Campus Ministry Office, which runs Catholic campus ministries at colleges and universities throughout western North Carolina.

Approximately 70 students and campus ministers from 11 colleges and universities participated in the retreat, headquartered at the McCarthy Spirituality Center on the Sisters of Mercy campus in Belmont. Students chose from a variety of service opportunities with the hope of making a difference in other people's lives.

SOUNDS OF GRATITUDE

Carlos Martinez (right), a displaced New Orleans musician, plays the drums during a jazz concert he arranged at Holy Name School in Topeka, Kan., Feb. 3 as a way to thank the school and parish for helping his family after Hurricane Katrina. Playing saxophone is Loren Pickford and playing keyboard is John Brewer; both are New Orleans musicians.

Jazzman relocated to Kansas by Katrina thanks community with concert

TOPEKA, Kan. (CNS) — Holy Name School and Church in Topeka extended a helping hand last fall to a New Orleans jazz musician and his family whose home was destroyed by Hurricane Katrina.

On Feb. 3, Carlos Martinez said thank you in the way he knows best — by bringing a jazz concert to the school free of charge.

Martinez, a percussion drummer, worked in the 1990s with the Neville Brothers on "Valence Street," an album that was later nominated for Best Rhythm and Blues Vocal Performance in 2000.

The Neville Brothers are one of New Orleans' most famous and popular music groups.

After his arrival in Topeka, Martinez won a grant from the Jazz Foundation to put displaced New Orleans musicians back to work. He assembled a six-piece band made up of fellow jazz musicians from New Orleans and is now touring area schools and nursing homes.

Before the concert, Martinez thanked the more than 400 people assembled in the gymnasium for their help in relocating his family to Topeka.

"Thanks to the school, Catholic Charities and Charles Moore. You have given us a new family," said Martinez.

Moore is a local hospital official.

The family of five made their way to Topeka after their home was inundated by nine feet of floodwater. They stayed at the Superdome for two days, then Martinez and his wife traveled by bus to a military base in Oklahoma, while their three children stayed with relatives in Baton Rouge, La.

The Martinezes were then driven by van to the Topeka area where they met Moore, director of medical facilities for the Kansas Bureau of Child Care and Health Facilities.

Moore offered the Martinez family a furnished, four-bedroom house rent-free. Meeting Moore was just the beginning of an outpouring of kindness from Topekans.

Holy Name School waived tuition for the three Martinez children, and after they joined their parents in Topeka, Holy Name parishioners helped outfit them with clothing and school supplies.

Martinez said Holy Name principal Tym Bonilla has taught the school's band some New Orleans-style music, and his wife, Latifa, has given dance instruction to the social graces class and helps with the school's children's wellness program.

"The family has been a wonderful blessing for us," Bonilla said.

One of the band members, saxophonist Loren Pickford, told the concert audience that Martinez was a real-life American hero.

"Carlos spent 48 hours rescuing people from the flood and taking them by boat to the Superdome," Pickford said.

As a tribute to the Topekans who had welcomed the Martinezes and so many others with open arms, the band performed "Over the Rainbow," from "The Wizard of Oz" as well as their traditional repertoire of New Orleans jazz.

Bill defining marriage as one man, one woman is killed in Maryland

BALTIMORE (CNS) — A bill that would have amended the Maryland Constitution to define marriage as being between one man and one woman was killed in the state's House of Delegates.

After learning that supporters of the marriage amendment had collected 47 delegate signatures that would have sent the measure directly to the House floor, Democratic Speaker of the House Michael Busch ordered an unusual recess Feb. 2 to prevent lawmakers from voting on the measure.

The House Judiciary Committee then killed the measure on a unanimous vote after members changed the bill to allow same-sex civil unions — a move Republican Minority Whip Anthony O'Donnell called a "poison pill" designed to guarantee the bill's defeat by altering its original purpose.

Richard Dowling, Maryland Catholic Conference's executive director, was not surprised the measure was defeated. He said Democratic Party leaders fear that if the amendment passes both houses and goes before Maryland voters in November the issue will increase support for Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich Jr.'s re-election.

"The debate has been driven by partisan interests and maneuvering, at least as much as by the marriage issue itself," said Dowling, who testified in support of the marriage amendment Jan. 31.

The drive to amend the constitution came after Baltimore Circuit Court Judge M. Brooke Murdock declared Maryland's 33-year-long ban on gay marriage unconstitutional. She stayed her ruling pending the outcome of an appeal to Maryland's Court of Appeals.

The Catholic conference is filing a friend-of-the-court brief in support of the appeal. Dowling said the bishops' opposition to the legalization of gay marriage is "not about denying persons the rights that are due them as citizens or barring individual citizens from participation in public or private program services and services that are generally accessible."

FROM THE VATICAN

Marking World Day of Sick, pope says God sent Jesus to heal, save

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Out of his great love for all creatures, God sent his son to heal and to save, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"Christ is the hand of God extended to humanity so it could escape the quicksand of sickness and death, standing on its feet on the solid rock of divine love," the pope said Feb. 12.

Pope Benedict used the main part of his midday Angelus address to remind people that the church celebrated World Day of the Sick Feb. 11 and to ask for continued prayers for those who are suffering.

He asked Mary to watch over all the sick, but especially those who also "suffer from solitude, poverty and marginalization."

While the main celebration of World Day of the Sick took place in Adelaide, Australia, Pope Benedict joined Italian sick people and their caregivers at the end of a Mass Feb. 11 in St. Peter's Basilica.

Before personally blessing many of the people in the basilica, the pope said the church dedicates the Feb. 11 feast of Our Lady of Lourdes to those who are ill because in Lourdes, France, Mary "demonstrated God's tenderness toward the suffering."

Appearing to St. Bernadette Soubirous in Lourdes, Mary came "to remind the modern world, which risks forgetting, that the primacy of divine grace is stronger than sin or death," the pope said.

The 2006 World Day of the Sick was dedicated in a special way to people with mental illnesses and to those who care for them.

The pope asked Catholic health workers to let the love of God be alive in their hearts so that it would give direction to their projects and plans, but especially to the way they care for their patients and the patients' families.

group will meet through Feb. 23 at 7 p.m. in the Fellowship Hall of St. Paul the Apostle Church, 2715 Horse Pen Creek Rd. For more information, call the church office at (336) 294-4696.

First lady meets with pope, discusses violence sparked by cartoons

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI expressed his hopes that the U.S. first lady's trip to the Winter Olympics in Turin, Italy, would be peaceful and spoke of his concern about violent protests taking place in many Islamic countries.

First lady Laura Bush and one of her 24-year-old twin daughters, Barbara Bush, met the pope at the Vatican Feb. 9 during a brief stop in Rome on the way to the Olympics.

After the meeting, she told reporters traveling with her that peace, terrorism and violence were among the topics the pope raised.

"He talked to me about the worries of terrorism, worries right now about violence in Beirut, Damascus and other cities" in the Middle East as protests continued over cartoons published in Europe that many Muslims find offensive.

"His hope and certainly our hope (is) for peace and tolerance" and for everyone to treat others with respect, she said.

Bush said she understood that Muslims could be offended by the cartoons and their caricatures of Mohammed, but "I do not think violence is the answer."

The pope met with Bush, her daughter and Francis Rooney, U.S. ambassador to the Vatican. After their greeting, the group spent about 15 minutes talking at the pope's desk out of earshot of reporters and photographers.

At the end of the audience, Bush gave the pope a small silver bowl inscribed with her husband's signature, her signature and the presidential seal. The pope gave the Bush women rosaries and the ambassador a medal.

Pope Benedict asked Bush to pass on his greetings to her husband and she said, "He sent his best wishes to you."

In a Feb. 9 interview with Vatican Radio, Bush said, "The United States finds it repugnant to find that people would depict Mohammed in a disrespectful and ugly way."

While free speech is an important value, she said, "many times free speech is offensive."

Calling for more dialogue among nations and religions, she said, "We expect people would give respect to the deeply held religious views of people around the world."

Calming the protest

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (CNS) — Anglican Archbishop Desmond Tutu speaks to supporters of Haitian presidential candidate Rene Preval as they try to enter the Montana Hotel, where electoral officials canceled a press conference to announce polling results in Port-au-Prince Feb. 13.

The archbishop was unable to leave the hotel to board a flight, but addressed the somewhat rowdy crowd, which calmed down and left.

Mass demonstrations erupted in Port-au-Prince, and at least one person was shot dead Feb. 13 following Feb. 7 presidential elections. Protesters said electoral officials were tampering with results to prevent Preval from winning 51 percent of the vote, which is needed to prevent a second round of elections; his lead had dropped from 60 percent to 48 percent.

Archbishop Tutu, a Nobel laureate and retired Anglican archbishop of Cape Town, South Africa, arrived in Haiti Feb. 11 at the invitation of the Peace and Tolerance Initiative, launched by the Organization of American States Special Mission and the Haitian bishops' conference.

Archbishop Tutu told Haitians that God has not forgotten them and will never forget them. He praised Haitians for their peaceful conduct throughout the elections and called on them to continue peacefully.

visiting Rome, Assisi, Pompeii and Sorrento Dec. 1-8.

But for two pilgrims, Blackwell and Matt Milunic, the highlight was meeting Pope Benedict XVI during the papal audience at the Vatican Dec. 7.

Blackwell was having difficulty with her back during the trip, making it difficult to walk to the various locations.

"It was taking a toll on her. So my wife, Julie, and I got her a wheelchair," said Milunic, a parishioner of Our Lady of Grace Church.

"We took her everywhere and she didn't get tired," he said.

"It was such a relief," said Blackwell.

When Milunic wheeled her into St. Peter's Square for the papal audience, a Vatican guard motioned for them to use a different entrance.

"I mildly protested. I didn't want to get separated from my wife and the group," said Milunic.

The two were redirected through several checkpoints, getting closer and closer to the front.

"The next thing I know, we're up on the platform," said Blackwell.

"They put us about 20 feet from the pope, with about 30 to 35 other people in wheelchairs," said Milunic.

Pope Benedict dedicated his catechesis that day to Psalm 136, a hymn of thanksgiving for the everlasting kindness of the Lord. At the end of his audience, the pope greeted visiting cardinals and bishops and then, those in the wheelchairs.

"I was shy. I didn't know what to say," said Blackwell. "So I said, 'Thank you.' He looked me in the eye and replied, 'Thank you.'"

"He took care to make eye contact and smile at everyone," said Milunic. "He shook my hand."

It was a memory that will remain with Blackwell, who attends Mass three times a week at Little Flower Assisted Living in Charlotte. She converted to Catholicism at around 7 years of age.

"I came from a three-room mill house in Augusta, Ga., and then there I was, looking at the pope," she said. "It was so exciting."

Even the pilgrims who did not get to meet the pope found the papal audience a highlight of the trip.

"To be in St. Peter's Square with thousands of other pilgrims all waiting to see the Holy Father — to perhaps touch his hand or cloak, to hear him speak — crowned the week," said Patty Jennings, secretary at Our Lady of Grace Church.

"It was an experience to be with so many others who wanted just the same — to be in the presence of our new Holy Father, Pope Benedict XVI," she said. "It was a faith-affirming morning."

In addition to visiting the four major basilicas of Rome and other attractions, the pilgrims attended Mass daily at various churches throughout Italy, including in a chapel at the tomb of St. Peter at the Vatican.

"I feel like this is my first Mass," said Father Andrew Latsko, a retired priest of the diocese, recalling the experience.

Many pilgrims said the trip deepened their faith.

"We came away having made new friends, having deepened relationships and having discovered common bonds. Now we are joined together by this faith experience," said Jennings. "It was a special beginning to the Advent season, and for many the journey to Christmas was enriched."

Upcoming youth pilgrimage centered on Eucharist

BELMONT — Bishop Peter J. Jugis invites all high school and college students to join him for a spiritual pilgrimage.

The second Youth Pilgrimage to Belmont Abbey will be held April 2.

The day of prayer and reflection, which is free to all participants, is part of the preparation for the upcoming diocesan Eucharistic Congress, themed "The Love of Christ Impels Us," to be held in Charlotte Oct. 6-7.

The theme is also Bishop Jugis' motto, taken from St. Paul's second letter to the Corinthian Church.

"During the year of preparation, we have the wonderful privilege to devote ourselves more faithfully to our Lord, who is truly present in the holy Eucharist," said Bishop Jugis.

Approximately 250 youths attended last year's pilgrimage. The upcoming event will feature a eucharistic procession and adoration, Benediction and confession.

"This will be a wonderful opportunity during Lent to offer the sacrifice of a spiritual pilgrimage, worship the Lord in adoration, spend time with Bishop Jugis and other youths from around the Diocese of Charlotte and receive abundant grace and mercy from God as we prepare for our second Eucharistic Congress in the Diocese of Charlotte," said David Hains, director of communications for the diocese.

Youth ministry and young adult group leaders are encouraged to register their groups by March 10.

WANT TO GO?

For more information or to register, contact Paul Kotlowski, director of diocesan youth ministry, by March 10 at (704) 370-3211 or e-mail pjkotlowski@charlottediocese.org.

College students spend weekend serving others

Kristen Raliski, a junior at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem, wanted to repeat the "awesome experience" she had on a service trip during her Christmas break.

"This was a weekend to get away and think about someone besides myself," said Raliski, who was on her first "Give Your Heart Away" weekend.

The students spent the retreat working at several area organizations, including Urban Ministries, Room at the Inn, Crisis Assistance Ministries, House of Mercy, Holy Angels and Marian Center, the Sisters of Mercy motherhouse.

At Urban Ministry Center in Charlotte, an interfaith organization that assists the poor and homeless, students served lunch to the homeless. Other students sorted through donated clothes at Crisis Assistance Ministry in Charlotte, which provides assistance and advocacy for people in financial crisis.

One group of students put together a Valentine's Day party for the residents of Holy Angels in Belmont, a nonprofit facility that provides programs for children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation.

Another group visited the residents and helped with spring cleaning at House of Mercy in Belmont, which provides nursing care to people living with advanced AIDS.

Projects planned for Shining Hope Farm, a therapeutic horseback-riding program for people with disabilities, and Habitat for Humanity were rained out, said Mary Wright, director of diocesan campus ministry.

"A weekend such as this is evidence that our college students truly choose to give their hearts to those less fortunate than they," said Wright. "More than 50 students sharing their hearts with others is a humbling experience for all of us."

Stephanie Auger, whose home parish is St. James Church in Concord, heard her fellow students at University of North Carolina at Charlotte talking about the 2006 weekend, and decided to join them.

"I love going on retreats and experiencing the camaraderie among other Catholics," Auger said.

Catholic Campus Ministry, funded by the Diocesan Support Appeal and donations, helps college students answer the call from the U.S. bishops to put Catholic social teaching into action.

Josh Hallingse said his previous two "Give Your Heart Away" weekends changed his perspective on why other students volunteer and the importance of living a "non-profit life."

As a result of his participation in last year's service weekend, students from Appalachian State University came to Charlotte to help with University of North Carolina at Charlotte's Relay for Life.

"This is also a good opportunity to network with students from other schools to plan fundraisers," said Hallingse, a senior at University of North

"It is my hope that after a weekend such as this, students understand that service is for a lifetime and not just a weekend," said Wright. "I hope they left with a deeper understanding of our social teachings, a deeper commitment to our faith, and a heart of compassion for those less fortunate."

Parishioners recognized for refugee assistance

GREENSBORO—Several parishioners of St. Pius X Church in Greensboro were recognized recently for their work with refugees.

Anthony and Peggy Delisi, James and Diane Wierman, and Rich and Barbara Houseknecht were presented with certificates of recognition by Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor, during Masses Jan. 28-29.

The parishioners were honored for their years of service at the Lutheran Family Services' refugee resettlement program in Greensboro.

"We are extremely proud of these recipients and offer them our gratitude and continued support," said Toni Redifer, St. Pius X Church's parish and community life director.

"They are so dedicated, putting in countless hours to help the refugees," she said.

By donating food, clothes, household items, medical assistance and educational needs, St. Pius X Church has a history of assisting Lutheran Family Services, which has sponsored Montagnard, Sudanese and Liberian families.

"St. Pius X Church is a leader not only in supporting efforts on behalf of refugees, but working with many other ecumenical and social justice programs as well," said Redifer. "It is a cooperative effort between St. Pius X and many of the outreach programs, faith communities and organizations here in Greensboro."

"Our parish is so supportive," she said. "I'm really in awe of all that they do."

Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William Church in Murphy and Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Hayesville, speaks on Christian unity at St. John Baptiste de la Salle Church in North Wilkesboro Jan. 13-14.

Priest, pope highlight need, steps for Christian unity

NORTH WILKESBORO — Catholics from around the Boone Vicariate recently came together to celebrate the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity.

A two-day celebration was held at St. John Baptiste de la Salle Church in North Wilkesboro Jan. 13-14. Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William Church in Murphy and Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Hayesville, was the featured speaker.

Parishioners from churches in the Boone Vicariate, as well as Lutheran church members from North Wilkesboro, attended the event.

In his talk entitled "The Reception," Father Kloster spoke about the renewal of the Catholic Church after the Second Vatican Council and how the church should recapture its early essence and live according to the teachings of the Gospels and Jesus.

Father Kloster described the three aspects of ecclesial reception: the importance of the church's work, the restoration of unity among all Christian churches and the dialogue and interaction among Christian churches.

During his weekly audience at the Vatican, Pope Benedict XVI said the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity, held Jan. 18-25, highlighted the need to "constantly pray to the Lord for the great gift of full unity among all Christ's disciples."

The pope also led an ecumenical evening prayer service closing the week, and said "the patient search for full communion among all the disciples of Christ" is based on the fact that God is love.

"Keeping our gaze on this truth, which is the culmination of divine revelation, divisions — while maintaining their painful seriousness — appear possible to overcome and do not discourage us," the pope said.

Drawn together by the same baptism and the same faith in Jesus as lord, Christian communities must overcome their divisiveness, but not necessarily their different ways of expressing and celebrating their faith, he said.

A DAY WITH THE RESURRECTION IN THE FOUR GOSPELS

Thursday, March 23

or

Saturday, March 25

9 am - 4 pm

Dr. Peter Judge

This Scripture day will examine the Resurrection stories in the four Gospels to reflect on the presentations of the empty tomb discovery and the appearances of the Risen Jesus. We will compare and contrast the accounts of the four canonical Gospels and connect the particular theology of each Gospel. Participants will explore the spirituality available in each account and appreciate how that speaks to believers today through sharing their reactions to the stories.

Dr. Judge teaches Scripture and Religion at Winthrop University in Rock Hill and has experience in Hospice ministry.

The same program is offered both days.

Diocese holds first Spanish-language seminar on RCIA

The RCIA outlines the norms and rituals for adults who wish to enter the Catholic Church. The Diocesan Commission on the RCIA is part of the diocesan faith formation office.

The seminar was designed to provide an overview of the RCIA process, including its four stages: precatechumenate, catechumenate, purification and enlightenment, and mystagogy.

With a growing number of Hispanics entering the Catholic Church in the Diocese of Charlotte, the seminar offered catechists an opportunity to meet and exchange ideas.

"At the beginning, we thought that most of the community here was bilingual," said Carlos Casteneda, commission member. "We always invited them (Hispanics) to English-language workshops."

Late in 2005, the commission began receiving requests for faith formation training in Spanish, especially the RCIA.

"The sheer number of people coming from towns that are two hours away shows us that they want to participate, especially today, with this weather," said Casteneda. "The people need this."

The seminar was led by Nelson Bonet, a board member of the North American Forum on the Catechumenate and a member of the missionary group Amor en Accion, Spanish for Love in Action.

"Nelson Bonet offered great tips on how to 'break the ice' between the new catechumens and the catechist," said Ibis Centeno, Hispanic coordinator at St. Therese Church in Mooresville.

"He suggested we ask questions about trust and distrust at the beginning to get them accustomed to participating in the sessions," said Centeno. "By sharing their own personal experiences and getting acquainted with other members of the group early, the catechists will have a better idea of their progress as time goes by."

This seminar was one of a number of ways the diocesan faith formation office is reaching out to Hispanic members of the diocese.

In recent years, the office has supplied the office's western region with copies of "Eco de Fe," a video-assisted catechist formation program developed by the National Conference for Catechetical Leadership. The office also translated into Spanish the entire Catechist Recognition Process, a competency-based catechist formation process.

Kimmie Meissner performs during the women's long program at the U.S. figure skating championships in St. Louis Jan. 14. The 16-year-old skater from the Archdiocese of Baltimore is competing in the Winter Olympic Games in Turin, Italy.

Faith, family are priorities for 16-year-old Olympic figure skater

BY JENNIFER WILLIAMS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BEL AIR, Md. — Sixteen-year-old Olympic figure skater Kimmie Meissner may dazzle audiences and judges with her triple-axel jump, but off the ice, the high school junior is about as grounded as they come.

Shortly after the U.S. figure-skating championships in St. Louis in mid-January, in which she scored a second-place spot and a follow-up appearance on NBC's "Today" show, Meissner spent a Wednesday night eating with her parents, Judy and Paul, and studying for an upcoming algebra exam.

Like her life, Kimmie's room is split between the ordinary and her Olympic skater status, with clothes piled on a chair in one corner and competition medals hanging from another.

And while her rigorous practice schedule leaves no time for signature high school moments such as the school prom, participation in clubs or even lunch with friends, the teenager still leads a relatively normal life.

She goes to church on Sundays — her family belongs to St. Ignatius Church in Hickory, Md. — and she goes running with her dogs, watches television and snuggles at night with her cat, Ozzie.

"Sometimes he'll sleep on my head," the teen said with a grin.

Since she first hit the ice at age 6, her love of skating has been as gripping as the toe pick on the blade of a figure skate.

"Skating makes me so happy," said the young Olympian. "I'm not just doing it for a medal."

Even when she's told she should rest, Meissner said, she is itching to get her feet on the ice.

Over the span of a decade, her passion for and dedication to the sport have remained unwavering.

"I try to remind myself what my ultimate goal is," she said. "It could just be a little goal for the day like I want to skate a clean round or it could be a big goal like I want to go to nationals."

Meissner glides into a discussion about her family and her faith as smoothly as she swirls around a Delaware ice rink.

"God plays an important role in my life," she said. "I realize my talent was given to me by him, and I try to use it to the best of my ability."

She never prays to God to help her win, but when she was suffering a cold at nationals and her energy was sapped, she did look to God and thought, "I just need to do one program, and I would love to do good."

The teenager is keenly aware of her parents' sacrifices.

"My mom gives up a lot of social time," Meissner said. "And the boots and blades can be expensive. Everything piles up. I wouldn't be where I am today without their sacrifices."

"We're just so proud of her, because as good as she is on the ice, we know she's even better off the ice," said Judy Meissner, her mother.

Watching their daughter compete is stressful, said Paul Meissner, Kimmie's father, who himself plays ice hockey.

"She's a very determined young lady," he said.

Catholic involvement seen at Olympics

A Swiss Guard, who was sporting a tracksuit and sneakers instead of his usual colorful uniform, held the torch aloft for the blessing. The guard had received the flame from a Vatican gendarme, making it the first time Vatican representatives ever participated as Olympic torchbearers.

While the Vatican has never sent anyone to compete in the Olympics, the Vatican has a representative at the games.

For the first time, the head of the Vatican's new sports office, U.S. Father Kevin Lixey, is in Turin to network with national Olympic committees and chaplains from other countries. It will be the Legionaries of Christ priest's Olympic debut; the Vatican's church and sport desk was officially unveiled just days before the 2004 Summer Olympics in Athens, Greece.

Outreach and faith

Parish churches all over Turin and the surrounding mountain villages will have their doors wide open to the public. Three dioceses are hosting concerts, special exhibits and additional Masses in several languages.

While Olympic sponsors will be handing out freebies to spectators and visitors, local Catholic, Waldensian and Orthodox churches are distributing 50,000 free copies of a special Olympic edition of St. Mark's Gospel.

While the city of Turin is still an industrial icon of the Fiat automobile, it is just as well-known for being the home of the Shroud of Turin.

Many people believe this 17-foot-long linen cloth bearing the image of a crucified man is Jesus' burial cloth. It Competitors will represent some of the fittest, fastest and most graceful athletes in their sport, and some will also boast some strong spiritual muscle.

Rebecca Dussault, a U.S. cross-country skier from Colorado, will be following in the tracks of Blessed Pier Giorgio Frassati, born in Turin in 1901 and beatified by Pope John Paul II May 20, 1990.

When he was not studying for his degree in mining engineering or helping people in need, Blessed Pier Giorgio would be climbing or skiing the same peaks where some Olympic mountain events are being held.

Dussault has made him the patron of her journey to the games, and she's inscribed his name on her skis for, if not a competitive, then a spiritual edge.

Derek Parra, 2002 Olympic gold and silver medalist in men's speedskating, will glide his blades across Turin's new Lingotto rink. He's easy to spot: He's one of just a few Mexican-Americans to take to the Olympic ice, and he always makes the sign of the cross before the starting signal.

Catholics will also be represented on the U.S. figure skating, women's ice hockey and bobsled teams and in the stands as well, cheering on their favorite athletes.

While some athletes wear their faith on their sleeves — or their skis — they'll all be digging down deep within themselves to do their best and live out their dream of taking part in the Olympics.

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. — Peter Laviolette knows that at the 2006 Winter Olympics he'll be experiencing a privilege few people attain: Already a two-time Olympic competitor, he gets another chance to bring home the gold, this time as head coach of the U.S. men's Olympic ice hockey team.

"I think you're lucky to go to the Olympics once, privileged to go twice and blessed to go three times," said Laviolette, a Catholic who also coached Team USA at the 2004 and 2005 International Ice Hockey Federation World Championships.

"You wonder how many more times you have after three," he added.

Laviolette played on the 1988 U.S. Olympic team in Calgary, Alberta, and captained the 1994 squad that competed in Lillehammer, Norway.

Coaching the men's national team isn't the only role handled by this Franklin, Mass., native. He also coaches the National Hockey League's Carolina Hurricanes.

While steering a pro sports franchise and the national team simultaneously may seem like a daunting task, Laviolette takes it in stride.

"There wasn't a lot to do for USA Hockey for a few months. There were no players to coach," said Laviolette, who said the real hard work begins in the days leading up to the first game Feb. 15 against Latvia.

"It's a short tournament to run in a short amount of time," he added. "Strategically we're ready. There's not a lot you can do but be prepared."

Team USA was to practice together Feb. 14 before the first game. Then it would be five straight days of games before the medal round.

Laviolette's first head coaching assignment in the NHL was with the New York Islanders in 2001-03. He began his current assignment as head coach in Carolina midway through the 2003-04 season.

The Hurricanes failed to make the 2004 Stanley Cup playoffs, and last season was wiped out by the NHL's labor issues. But heading into this season's Olympic break, the Hurricanes sat atop the NHL standings.

Carolina, which in the past languished near the bottom of the league in goals scored, is almost unbeatable when scoring first and has yet to lose when leading after two periods.

Laviolette has not left his Catholic roots behind and incorporates his faith into his everyday life.

"I think the biggest thing for me is to try to be who I am. I try to be an honest person," Laviolette said. "You're a product of your environment. Growing up in a Catholic household, my parents taught me values consistent with Catholic teachings."

Peter Laviolette, coach of the National Hockey League's Carolina Hurricanes, is a two-time Olympic competitor and first-time head coach of the U.S. men's ice hockey team competing in the Olympic Winter Games in Turin, Italy.

Laviolette was coaching four of his Carolina Hurricanes players at the Olympics. Defenseman Bret Hedican and forwards Erik Cole and Doug Weight were on the regular roster, while forward Matt Cullen was a potential replacement player.

Having players who already play for a coach is important "because they're familiar with the team and you as a coach," said Laviolette.

"Ultimately, you need to get everyone on the same page instead of just a couple of guys. The team that has everyone working together has the best chance to succeed," he said.

Compendium of catechism goes on sale in paperback March 31

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Compendium of the Catechism of the Catholic Church, a 200-page synthesis of the 1992 catechism, will be available in paperback March 31 from USCCB Publishing, the publishing office of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

A hardcover edition will follow shortly after. Both versions will be published in English and Spanish.

The compendium, made up of 598 questions and answers, echoes to some degree the format of the Baltimore Catechism, which was standard in many U.S. Catholic parishes and schools from 1885 to the 1960s.

It also includes two appendices — a list of Catholic prayers in English or Spanish, side by side with the Latin versions, and a list of “formulas of Catholic doctrine,” including the Ten Commandments, the beatitudes, the theological and cardinal virtues, and the spiritual and corporal works of mercy.

Msgr. Daniel Kutys, USCCB deputy secretary for catechesis, said members of the U.S. bishops’ Committee on Catechesis have recommended that the compendium “be used as a standard reference companion to which teachers and catechists refer their students in much the same way they use Bibles for instruction.”

“It is not meant to replace religion textbooks, but to augment and complement them,” he added.

Pope Benedict XVI has said the compendium “contains, in concise form, all the essential and fundamental elements of the church’s faith.”

Priest says Michael Jackson unlikely to sing in papal prayer project

ROME (CNS) — Father Giuseppe Moscati said he never considered having Michael Jackson record all of the 24 prayers of Pope John Paul II he hopes eventually to set to music.

But, the priest said, to have Jackson sing one of the songs or to be part of a choir singing a song might have helped sales, reaching greater numbers of people.

However, when a Scottish newspaper published a story Feb. 6 saying there had been “secret discussions between the Roman Catholic Church and Michael Jackson to put the prayers of Pope John Paul II to music,” the project began to fall apart.

“It would be very difficult for the Vatican to accept the project,” said Father Moscati, director of Edizioni Musicali Terzo Millennio, a sacred music publishing and promotion company.

“Although he has been absolved by the courts” on charges of the sexual abuse of minors, it is clear Jackson’s image “cannot be put alongside that of the pope,” Father Moscati said.

The priest said he still would not mind the singer being involved on some level, but the furor created by the news reports makes Vatican approval doubtful.

“I did not go looking for him or for anyone else,” the priest said.

He mentioned the project to an acquaintance who claimed to know Jackson “and I thought he had contact with other singers as well.”

“I never met Michael Jackson or his representatives or his lawyers,” the priest said. “And it was very inappropriate of them to tell the press.”

Father Moscati said he went through dozens of texts of Pope John Paul’s homilies, speeches and remarks for various occasions, paying particular attention to the prayers the pope often used to close his remarks.

“Many of them are prayers for peace, for young people, for the family or prayers to Mary,” he said.

The priest obtained permission to use the prayers from the Libreria Vaticana Editrice, which holds the copyright to all papal texts.

However, the final project — including the music and the singers — must be approved by the Vatican before publication.

Father Moscati has hired two Italian composers to set a few of the texts to music, although he said that if he finds some well-known singers who want to compose the music themselves that would be fine.

“At this point, I am hoping to find a producer in the United States who would want to join the project and who has contacts with professional singers,” he said.

Spiritual transformation is continual, requires change

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When all is going well in your life and your spirit is in sync with God, just stay in the zone. You’re walking together: Jesus guiding, you following. Enjoy it, because it won’t last. So says this weekend’s Gospel.

Jesus’ disciples didn’t need to fast to seek closeness to God. Jesus was already with them. But one day he’d be taken away. Then they’d have to make serious decisions to walk with him again.

That’s how it always is in the world: Something or someone gets in the way of our relationship with God, and we must choose whether or not to do something about it.

It happened to Thomas. Ten years ago Thomas made a radical life change that many Christians have considered, but few have had the courage or strength to follow through with.

A faithful Catholic, Thomas had given years of hard work and commitment to his career, earning an enviable top executive position in a large, successful company. But when he began volunteering at an after-school program in an inner-city housing project, his heart moved.

As he continued working with young people and their families in the program that provided a variety of social services, he also was deepening his relationship with God through a faith-sharing group in his parish church. Soon he could see too clearly the injustices in the social fabric of his community — something previously he’d been blind to while walking the corporate corridors.

He realized the lifestyle formed by his career path had drawn him away from God. To the shock of his family and colleagues, he and his wife walked away from that life. Cold turkey.

They left a big city, big jobs and big income for a small community and scaled-back lifestyle to work in low-paying, local family service agencies.

In the language of the Gospel, Thomas had been filled with the new wine of active discipleship, having found Jesus in the families at the after-school program. He had to make a change.

If he’d stayed in the old skin of his rat-race career, his fervor for justice would have died of frustration — or his job would have failed for lack of heart.

Spiritual transformation is continual and requires foundational change at every turn. I wonder if it has happened to Thomas again.

Questions:

What transforming moments in your walk with Jesus have brought you to make a dramatic change in your life? Where do you see a need for change to draw you closer to Jesus?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

“I will lead her into the desert and speak to her heart” (Hosea 2:16).

Amazing siblings

Catholic winners of $1 million 'Amazing Race' prize put family first

BY SISTER EILEEN CONNELLY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CINCINNATI — The Linz siblings of Cincinnati, who emerged as the winners of the CBS series "The Amazing Race" in December, credit a Catholic school background with their knowledge of geography and their use of teamwork.

The Linzes — Nick, 25; Alex, 23; Megan, 21; and Tommy, 20 — were the first team to cross the finish line near Niagara Falls, N.Y., netting a $1 million prize.

Since the show's finale, the siblings have been busy with interviews and public appearances, including a visit to Immaculate Heart of Mary School in Cincinnati, where they all attended grade school.

They received an enthusiastic welcome from the faculty and students as they recounted some of their experiences.

Alex Linz, a 2000 graduate of St. Xavier High School who currently works as an emergency department technician at Mercy Hospital Anderson, credited the education they received and the values they learned at the school with helping them to win the competition.

"Our teachers at IHM always taught us to use teamwork," he said. "They always encouraged us and were role models. I owe the person that I am today to them."

"I was fortunate enough to have taught all the Linz children," said Brother Ed Kesler, a Brother of St. Francis of the Poor and assistant principal at the school. "While here, they all displayed the team spirit and quick thinking that was evident during 'The Amazing Race' challenge."

"What a blessing it is as a Catholic educator to see such strong character and deep faith revealed by your students in such a public way," he added.

That character was demonstrated when the Linz siblings announced on national television that their prize money would be shared with their family. Half will go to their parents, Tom and Terri Linz, and the rest will be split seven ways among the four race participants and their three brothers who did not appear on the show.

"The money doesn't equate to what our parents have done for us," Alex Linz said, "and we wanted our siblings to know that we wish they could have been there."

When she heard her children's plans for their winnings, "it made me realize how special they are," said Terri Linz, "I watched each week with a lot of pride, although I did have to cover my eyes occasionally."

The dogs struggle against the odds while their devoted handler (Walker) races against time and indifference to mount a rescue mission. Set against spectacular South Pole vistas, the film balances action and heart-tugging emotion in telling its captivating tale of friendship and canine courage.

The Linzes were on a family trip to Cancun, Mexico, during the Christmas holidays in 2004 when they were approached by a CBS casting director and asked to audition for the show.

"We'd always joked that we'd never do reality TV, but 'The Amazing Race' was different," recalled Megan Linz, a 2003 graduate of St. Ursula Academy and now a student at Miami University in Ohio. "It seemed so real and so fun."

This season of "The Amazing Race" was the show's first "family edition" with 10 four-person teams. The families raced around the United States and Central America.

From the start of the race, Alex Linz said, "we didn't really have a strategy, because we didn't really see it as a competition. It was more of an opportunity to have fun, to have an adventure."

"We did decide that we were going to try not to fight and to keep the bickering at a minimum," added his sister. "We just wanted to play the game the best we could and do it for the experience, not the prize."

"The most important thing is that we were ourselves the entire time," Megan Linz added. "We never had to change who we are. We stuck to the values our parents taught us."

While Megan Linz is close to her brothers and is a self-admitted tomboy, she said it was hard being the only girl on the team.

"I can run with the boys for sure, but I can still be sensitive," she said.

Alex and Megan Linz both say the experience opened their eyes to different cultures and taught them patience and the importance of teamwork.

"It also reinforced what I already knew — that I have a great family," Alex Linz said.

Opponents of embryonic stem-cell research get good news, bad news

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The first weeks of 2006 brought good news and bad news for opponents of embryonic stem-cell research, as a bill that would have encouraged the research in Delaware got significant revisions but new proposals supporting it cropped up in New Jersey and Michigan.

In Florida, competing initiatives on taxpayer funding for embryonic stem-cell research each failed to gain the 611,000 signatures needed to place it on the state's November ballot; the Florida bishops had backed a proposal to prohibit such research.

The heads of Virginia's two Catholic dioceses also issued a joint pastoral letter on "Science at the Service of Life," in which they called embryonic stem-cell research both unethical and unproven.

The Delaware effort to block a bill that would have given state sanction to embryonic stem-cell research was led by a grass-roots group called A Rose and a Prayer.

After the House approved a drastically amended version of the bill in January, Stephen Jenkins, a Wilmington attorney who helped form the organization late last year, said it would now seek to ban all research on embryos in the state, along with all forms of human cloning.

As passed in the House, the bill bans human reproductive cloning and the sale of human embryos but makes no mention of embryonic stem-cell research. Democratic Sen. Robert Venables and Republican Rep. Deborah Hudson, the bill's primary sponsors, had characterized the bill as a way for Delaware to be at the forefront of embryonic stem-cell research in the United States.

The revised bill now returns to the Senate, which had approved the original version last June. The Senate may approve the revised bill, amend the House version or take no action.

The Diocese of Wilmington and pro-life groups in Delaware had vigorously opposed the original legislation because it allowed for the destruction of human embryos. Republican Rep. Joseph G. DiPinto, co-sponsor of the House amendment that eliminated any mention of embryonic stem cells, said he may introduce legislation this spring to encourage adult stem-cell research, which the church supports.

"There is no reason why Delaware could not be a center of scientific excellence with regard to the development of adult stem-cell research," DiPinto, a Catholic and a retired DuPont scientist, told The Dialog, the newspaper of the Diocese of Wilmington.

'Clone and kill' legislation

In New Jersey, legislation recently introduced in the Legislature would ask voters to approve $230 million in public bonds for stem-cell research grants to universities, academic medical institutions and other entities in the state conducting scientific and medical research.

Another bill would authorize $150 million for the construction of the Stem Cell Institute of New Jersey in New Brunswick and another $60 million for research.

Two similar bills passed the Senate in 2005, but expired because the Assembly failed to take them up before the end of the legislative session that ended Jan. 9.

Under a 2003 state law, human embryos derived from fertility clinics can be used in research.

"We need to be clear that this funding will allow research to advance that will allow the creating, the cloning and the killing of human beings through the embryonic, fetal and newborn stages," said Marie Tasy, executive director of New Jersey Right to Life.

In Michigan, Gov. Jennifer Granholm's call in her State of the State address to repeal Michigan's law prohibiting human cloning and embryonic stem-cell research drew strong criticism from the Michigan Catholic Conference.

Paul A. Long, the conference's vice president for public policy, said Granholm was irresponsible in telling Michigan families that the repeal would "lead to some sort of miracle cure."

The governor "is misleading these suffering families into believing that such 'clone and kill' legislation will alleviate the debilitating diseases that ail humanity," Long said.

"The facts are that scientists have been performing stem-cell research on embryos for over 30 years, and to date have yet to produce any miracle cures," he said.

Advocating for change

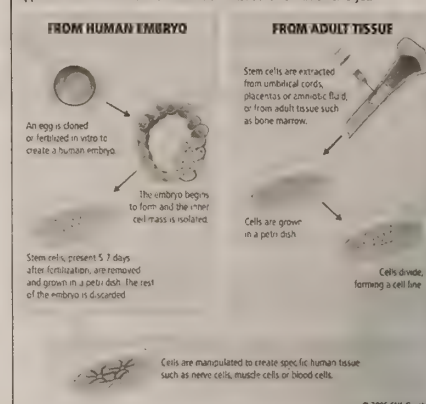

Florida groups that had supported proposals for and against taxpayer funding of embryonic stem-cell research vowed to continue their efforts to amend the state constitution, now aiming for the 2008 ballot.

"Without such an amendment, the people of Florida will be at risk for cooperation in destructive embryo research by supporting it with our tax revenues," the Florida Catholic bishops said last September.

The bishops also oppose a new proposal in the Legislature to provide

CREATING STEM-CELL LINES

Scientists believe stem cells could repair diseased or injured tissues. The Catholic Church opposes stem-cell research that involves the destruction of human embryos.

$150 million in state funding over 10 years for embryonic stem-cell research.

Virginia Bishops Paul S. Loverde of Arlington and Francis X. DiLorenzo of Richmond said in their Feb. 2 letter that the newly established Virginia Catholic Conference would be "marshaling resources for the critical advocacy work needed to promote state investments in life-affirming research and at the same time protect the lives of embryonic human beings."

"Our church embraces scientific and medical advances that save lives, cure diseases and improve health, as long as those advances are not made by exploiting, harming or killing another member of our human family," the bishops said.

A growing effort

School recognized for beautification program

WINSTON-SALEM — Good things are blooming at St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem.

The school garden club was featured in the November/December 2005 issue of Today's Catholic Teacher for their school beautification efforts.

On Feb. 1, during Catholic Schools Week, a magazine representative visited the school to present a School of the Month plaque. Principal Georgette Schraeder and fifth-graders Hannah Lee and Allan Washing, student gardeners; and Barb Vickland, garden club president, accepted the award from Annie Galvin Teich, vice president of catechetical products and services at Today's Catholic Teacher.

"As we completed renovations to upgrade our 50-year-old building on the inside, it immediately became evident that while beauty on the inside was important, we wanted to look beautiful on the outside as well," said Donna Birkel, school administrative assistant.

The beautification program, now in its third year, has been assisted by the PTO-sponsored student garden club, the Dandyions (formerly known as Bloomsquad), as well as teachers, parents and other students.

"I enjoyed working and planning with the students and faculty last year and look forward to helping the students appreciate the beauty, hard work and successful feeling gardening gives," said Barb Vickland, Dandyions moderator and teacher's assistant.

Students in second-through-eighth-grade are eligible for the garden club, which has helped by cleaning, weeding, planting and watering plants around the school campus. In addition to the achievements of the beautification project, students have learned about agriculture and ecology during the process.

Third-grade teacher Maureen Patti introduced a cabbage plant program, which she has used for teaching math graphing. Middle-school science teacher Mythily Isaac has plans for a container garden this year, as does pre-kindergarten teacher Jan Wilson.

Sixth-grade students made decorative stones, which have been placed in front of the school along with student-built birdhouses.

The beautification project will soon involve a prayer garden, for which the students will create free-form stepping stones from clay.

"They will then choose a line from a Bible passage or a short prayer and etch this with a pointed tool into the surface of the stone," said art teacher Stephanie Iauco.

Placed randomly throughout the garden, the stones will provide an environment of beauty and contemplation.

"The best part of it all is that it just keeps growing in terms of the number of people involved and the opportunities for mental and spiritual growth," said Schraeder.

"I've even started my own garden at home," said fifth-grader Hannah Lee, a Dandyions member.

"It doesn't happen overnight. Gardens take time to grow and develop," said Schraeder. "You may have to uproot something you planted to allow something more beautiful to grow."

And that in itself is a significant lesson these students are learning.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Should you be committed?

Ability to change, grow lies within each person

You know who you are.

You're the one who sat on your sofa watching the Pasadena Rose Parade on television, volume low to tune out Teri Hatcher and the marching bands, pencil in hand, making your list of New Year's resolutions for 2006.

Well, now that the year is well under way, how are you doing with that list? What's that, you say? You've already thrown it away? Just can't do it? Who needs tired old resolutions anyway?

Take heart and read on, because you are certainly not alone.

How many of us have already given up on the New Year's resolutions we so optimistically set only a short time ago? Lose weight, stop smoking, be more patient with the kids, attend Mass more regularly ... it all sounded pretty good a few weeks ago, right? Yet here we are thinking, "Well, maybe next year."

What are we missing? What is that elusive "thing" that keeps us from achieving what we promise ourselves year after year?

Commitment. We need to be committed. No, not to an asylum, but to making the changes that will lead to better living.

As the German philosopher Goethe tells us, "Until one is committed, there is hesitancy, the chance to draw back ... the moment one definitely commits oneself, then Providence moves, too."

When we take steps to honor our promise to ourselves, how could God, who loves us, not help us along? For those of us whose spirit is willing, but the flesh is ... well, not so willing, let the following points strengthen your resolve and move you toward commitment.

Believe in yourself. When we don't have the belief that we are capable of making a particular change, then our chances of accomplishment are pretty slim. When we fail, we tell ourselves, "Who was I kidding? I knew I wouldn't be able to see this through."

If you are having a hard time buying into your goal, try "borrowing" someone else's belief in you for a while. A friend or loved one who says, "I believe you can do this," can be the beginning of building confidence in yourself.

Be accountable. It's a little too easy for us to let ourselves "off the hook." We tend to take our promises more seriously when they are made to another person.

Tell a friend what you are trying to achieve. Invite that person to take an active role in helping you stay on track. Having someone to answer to can improve your commitment to a goal.

Be resilient. Like the song says, "I get knocked down, but I get up again ..." Failure to meet a goal at the end of the day has nothing to do with our chances of meeting that goal tomorrow. Every day is a fresh opportunity as long as we choose to see it that way.

Break it down. Sometimes we have trouble staying committed to a plan when it is too big, complex or vague. Break a goal down into manageable steps with a timeframe for beginning and an end. Instead of trying to lose thirty pounds in six months, try four or five pounds on a month-by-month basis.

Now grab that pencil and commit yourself! Remember, the season of Lent begins March 1. We're entering a time of change and resurrection. The possibilities are endless!

Pope Benedict concludes series of audience talks begun by predecessor

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Concluding a series of audience talks begun by Pope John Paul II in 2001, Pope Benedict XVI said the psalms and canticles used for morning and evening prayer are a "flowering garden" of praise and contemplation.

At his weekly general audience Feb. 15, the pope announced that with a brief meditation on Mary's Magnificat he was concluding the series begun "years ago by my beloved predecessor, the unforgettable Pope John Paul II."

Because of the large number of visitors present, the pope actually held two audiences: one in St. Peter's Basilica and the other in the Vatican audience hall. The crowd included some 6,000 Italian grade school and high school students.

The pope told the students he was sure they had heard about his first encyclical, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love"), in which "I wanted to recall that the source and reason for our true joy is the love of God."

"I invite each of you to understand and increasingly accept this love, which changes lives and will make you credible witnesses of the Gospel," he said. "In this way, you will become authentic friends of Jesus and his faithful apostles."

The pope told the young people that they must help the weak and needy "feel the tenderness of the heart of God" and that by doing so they would make the world more just.

Over the course of the five years of the audience series, the psalm or canticle chosen for the papal meditation each week was sung at the beginning of the audience by a soloist and one or two other singers.

But for the series finale, members of the Sistine Chapel choir sang the Magnificat.

Mary's hymn of praise to God for the great things he had done for her, the pope said, illustrates the "spirituality of the biblical 'anawim,' those faithful who saw themselves as poor not only in their detachment from any idolatry of riches and power, but also in their profound humility of heart, free of any temptation toward pride, open to the flow of divine saving grace."

Pope Benedict said he is "touched and surprised" every time he reads St. Ambrose's commentary on the Magnificat, especially the Italian saint's observation that "if, according to the flesh, there is only one mother of Christ, according to faith all souls generate Christ."

"Interpreting the words of the Madonna," the pope said, St. Ambrose "invites us to make sure that in our souls and in our lives the Lord finds a dwelling place, and not just a dwelling place to carry him in our hearts, but to carry him into the world, generating Christ in our time."

"Let us pray to the Lord that he helps us magnify him with the spirit of Christ and to carry him once again into the world," the pope said.

The miracle beyond reality

Jesus' body and blood is there for all to see

Recently, Dr. James McGovern, a doctor of pediatric cardiology, gave a presentation that not only re-enforced our belief in the Eucharist, but also confirmed that many of us witness a eucharistic miracle weekly, even daily.

For Catholics, the Eucharist is where mere bread and wine are transubstantiated; that is, transformed into Christ's body and blood. Even though it still looks like bread and wine, it has been transubstantiated and is wholly Jesus Christ.

But to believe such a miracle, one needs to look at the evidence.

When you think about it, Christ actually said that the Eucharist really is him. He used the strongest language possible (six times in the Gospel of John) that there was no symbolism and that this was in fact God.

Those doubting, and there were many, decided to bolt with this alleged talk of cannibalism. Jesus did not ask them to come back and did not say he was speaking only figuratively.

But scroll back to Lanciano, Italy in 750 A.D. In the middle of consecration, a Basilian monk in a St. Legontian monastery saw the unspeakable — the bread and wine suddenly became flesh and blood, visually, there on the altar.

The monk was at first dumbfounded and paralyzed with fear. He then became elated after realizing what had just happened — the bread and wine had been changed into Jesus' body and blood as always, but this time there was actual flesh and blood on the altar.

The doubting Thomases were innumerable. Finally in 1970, a full roundtable of research, clinical tests and examinations were conducted. Unexplainable events were confirmed.

In 1981, a repeat external and microscopic analysis of the host tissue was performed. Incredibly, the tissue and the blood still remained intact after 1,250 years without being hermetically sealed.

Further, the blood type was found to be AB, consistent with other confirmed miracles in which the wine had become blood. Scientific analysis concluded the flesh to be cardiac (heart) muscle. Microscopic visualization and other testing demonstrated interconnections and bridges proving heart origin.

In another test that used rabbit, ox and human controls, anti-human antibodies confirmed the human origin. This is particularly interesting as there is a long tradition of Jesus' sacred heart within the Catholic Church.

As Louis Pasteur stated, "A little bit of science averts people from God; a lot of it takes us back to him." One specific earth-shattering fact was that the surface of the transformed tissue was perfectly smooth — never raised, chapped or carved — though neither laser cutters nor human dissection existed in 750 A.D.

Bottom line, all faithful Catholic would hope that everyone would be in communion with this belief. For those who think that they have never seen an actual miracle, Lanciano awaits you now in Italy.

But to see the same miracle without traveling to Italy and without all the bells and whistles, all you have to do is go to Mass, where we can receive the transubstantiated body and blood.

As a Catholics, I pray that whoever sees the Eucharist (Jesus' body and blood) will not bolt as so many did in 33 A.D.

Why is Sunday the Lord's Day?

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN
DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. Please explain the church's teaching on why Sunday is recognized as the Lord's Day. Is not the Sabbath mentioned in the Ten Commandments a Saturday? Granted, Jesus rose on Sunday, but what about God's commandment to keep holy the Sabbath? (New York)

A. First, Sabbath does not mean Saturday. The term comes from the Hebrew word "shabbath," to rest.

In the Jewish calendar this was the seventh day of the week, a day to imitate God's "rest" after the biblical six days of creation (Ex 20:11 and 31:17). The Hebrew community set aside this day for worship and rest from daily work, even for slaves and cattle.

Detailed regulations listing a variety of forbidden works, including prohibitions against cooking, lighting a fire and gathering manna in the desert, are found in the early books of the Hebrew Scriptures, the Old Testament. Violations often were punishable by death.

Even in later times Jesus himself was challenged by religious leaders for allowing his followers to pick ears of corn to eat on the Sabbath.

Though they were mostly Jews, the first Christians soon changed the Sabbath day of rest and prayer to Sunday for a variety of reasons.

First, as you note, the fact that the resurrection of Jesus is recorded in the Gospels as occurring on the first day of the week had much to do with making this the appropriate day to celebrate the Lord's Supper.

The pre-eminent celebration of the central event of their faith, the resurrection, was the Sunday Eucharist, though that specific name wasn't in the Christian vocabulary until some time later.

Christians also changed other days of observance, such as days of fast and penance, from those prescribed by Jewish law, partly to emphasize the separation from their Israelite roots.

Not until centuries later, after the Reformation, was there any significant Christian move against celebration of Sunday as the Lord's Day. When the Seventh Day Adventist Church began about the middle of the 19th century, four men and one woman who formed its nucleus were somehow convinced that Saturday should still be the "holy day" of the week.

It is one of the lesser ways the teachings of that denomination diverge from historic Christian tradition.

The "day of rest" called for in the Ten Commandments is still, as it always has been, part of Catholic Christian observance.

A time like no other

New year brings opportunities for planning

If you're like most of us, you have begun 2006 with a feeling of renewal that accompanies the start of another new year. You may be motivated to finish those tasks that have been put off for so long before you look toward accomplishing new goals.

If 2006 inspires you to review or begin your estate plan, here's a quick outline that experts suggest to help you prepare your will. Reflecting on these questions will allow you to have your ideas recorded in logical order and save you time and expense when you meet with your attorney or financial advisor.

— Who is important to you? Start with those who may be dependent on you for financial support, including your spouse, children, parents, siblings, grandchildren or others. Record each person's name, age and relationship to you.

Then consider your parish, Catholic school, Catholic agency, the diocesan foundation or the Diocese of Charlotte, along with anyone else you may want to include in your estate plan.

— What do you own? Everyone has an estate, not just the wealthy. Include in this list everything of value, as this is what makes up your estate: your house(s), automobile(s), cash, savings accounts, securities, real estate, life insurance, stocks, bonds and retirement plan assets, art, jewelry and any other property of value.

List the present value of each item, what it cost and any income it provides. List any mortgages or other debts.

— How do you wish to distribute your property? Jot down your ideas as you answer this question and think about who will receive the property you own.

You may want to designate specific items to some, while others would receive a dollar amount or percentage of your estate. You are the only one who can make these decisions based on your desires and the needs of each heir.

— Who can help you put your plans into action? In order for your planning to result in the distribution you intend, it's important to have the best possible professional advice. Your attorney can draft your will and offer suggestions for the very best ways to accomplish your wishes.

Additional financial advisors may be needed as well, depending on the complexity of your estate.

Make time now to do some estate planning and draft or revise your will as you look to those things you have been putting off and begin to focus on goals for this year.

The old saying, "You can't take it with you," is only partially true. What you can take with you is the satisfaction of knowing you have left your possessions where they can do the greatest good.

Parish of St. Mary Church flourishes in mountain community of Sylva

SYLVA — The history of St. Mary Church involves the missionary zeal of a number of diocesan and Glenmary priests who have served in western North Carolina's mountain towns. But it was a layman known for his own missionary spirit who was instrumental in giving the Sylva church its start.

Prior to the mid-1950s, Catholics gathered for Mass in private homes, the local American Legion building and a downtown hotel.

Meanwhile, Michael William Murphy, who as a young Detroit businessman came to know Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh, had taken an interest in the missionary territory of western North Carolina. After his mother's death, Murphy moved to North Carolina and made a name for himself as a church builder.

After assisting in the construction of St. William Church in Murphy, Murphy came to Sylva and met Father (later Msgr.) Lawrence Newman. For several years in the 1950s, Father Newman served as pastor of St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville, which ministered to Catholic communities throughout North Carolina's westernmost counties.

With Murphy's financial assistance and Father Newman's direction, construction of a Catholic church in Sylva was soon underway.

In August 1955, Bishop Waters dedicated St. Mary Church and conferred the sacrament of confirmation on a group of parishioners. Murphy's work was done in Sylva for the time being, but his name would have a familiar ring in the area for years to come.

In May 1972, he was ordained to the priesthood at age 80 in the church he had helped build nearly 30 years before.

In June 1955, Bishop Waters invited the Glenmary missionaries of Cincinnati to minister west of Waynesville.

Two Glenmary priests, Fathers Robert Healy and Francis Schenk, were appointed to the pastorate of the region and shared duties in Franklin, Bryson City, Cherokee, Cullowhee and Sylva.

St. Mary Church was a mission of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin until 1972, when the Diocese of Charlotte was formed and the church received parish status. Glenmary Father John Loftus was appointed as the first pastor.

St. Mary Church has served the needs of its parishioners for a half century, experiencing much growth and change. In July 1983, a three-phase building program was devised to include construction of a new parish hall, worship space and rectory.

The Glenmary's pastorate ended in Sylva in 1988, when Father William Evans was appointed administrator.

Over the years, building programs added the parish hall and classroom facility, the church was enlarged and a rectory was built. Parishioners did much of the work. At the request of Father James Cahill, who preceded Father Ray Williams as pastor, parishioners dedicated a memorial to the unborn.

Within the last few years, the church has been remodeled and confessionals have been constructed. In 2005, a new
